Schoeler, an engraver here, is making a tool basket out of a cherry pit. He will fill the basket with minute tools, the Cabinet yesterday, the resignation and he has been priding himself especially upon the scissors. They are of microscopic size, but perfectly made in every point. It took several days' work to produce them and now Schoeler has lost them. They were lying on his work table, across which a common horsefly started. The fly's legs got tangled in the handle, and the fly rose and flew. The scissors were so light that the insect carried them without trouble, and Schoeler has not seen
