'Is my father at home?" asked Mark, "Is my father at home?" asked Mark, a little crossly, for such a welcome as this jarred upon his nerves.

"Why, save us, it's Master Mark.
Lord, sir, how you be growed out of sight! You give one quite a turn."

"I was expected, was I not?"

"Well, Master Mark, sir, I did hear something. But master, he've dined—"

"Oh, I didn't mean that. Is he in, or my sister?"

"Master's in the surg'ry. And Miss Lorry-I'll go and fetch her."

Master's in the surgry. And Miss Lorry—I'll go and fetch her."
And this was the triumphant return! Presently, however, down ran Miss Lorry—beaming, gushing, rosy and untidy. "Oh. Mark!" she cried, throwing herself upon him with a rush, "we'd quite given you up! How hungry you must be!"—was it his fancy only that she said "'ungry"? "But I'm so glad! Did you come all the way from Cambridge today?" This was not likely, seeing that the journey was over two hundred miles. "Only think! Why, I shouldn't have known you? I am so glad!" And to do her justice, she looked as pleased as she said she was. "It is a long time, isn't it? And my father?"

"Oh, he's all right; Jane is gone to tell him. He'll be here directly. Oh, I am so sorry! We had dinner at one, I wonder is there anything in the house? Oh, of course, there's the mutton; I daresay it's got cold by now. Or it might be warmed, mightn't it? Oh, here's papa! I thought he wouldn't be long."

And so in came Mr. Warden from the surgery—tail, big, loose, florid, loud-mannered and loud-voiced as ever, or rather more than ever, bringing with him a jovial smile, and an atmosphere that showed that if Lorry had been answeral for the scent of the wall-flowers he are responsible for the other part of the door of the room.

"I've had to work for it, though."

"Well, well, that's all the better, isn't it? Everybody ought to put his shoulder to the wheel—that's my maxim. But all work and no play, you know. So now you've come to idle a bit, hey?"

It was both red and tepid; but hunger, though used to look for its satisfaction to the high table of St. Margaret's, is still hunger, and Mark had not grown too dainty to be superior to the effects of a long day spent on the roof of a coach. Politics had not been in Mark's line, and Polities had not been in Mark's line, and so he only asked the question for the sake of saying something.

"But you couldn't do that very well."

"Couldn't I, though? And I would have, too, only then there's that other ass, young Smith, who's got hold of that lot. What they can see in him the Lord knows. Why, he isn't as old as you are. Jones don't know a liver from a stomach, but Smith don't know man from mutton. No, no. I must vote for Church and King—Church and King, you know—if it is only to put down young Smith. 'Confound their politics, frustrate their knavish tricks!' Now. Lorry, just get out the tumblers, there's a girl, and the brandy. I'm going to have a pipe."

His son did not smoke, nor did he drink spirits, whatever taste he, as a college fellow, had managed to acquire for the nobler port. So he sat unoccupied while his father filled a long clay pipe, of the kind known to connoisseurs as a "churchwarden." and mixed himself a pretty stiff tumbler.

"And now we're comfortable and all at home again," said the latter. "Why, bless my soul, Lorry, you haven't had that window mended yet! We don't want that sort of draught—ha, ha, ha! And now, Mark, my boy, what's next?"

"What is it to be, then?"

"I think I shall go to London and read for the bar. I've got my fellowship to keep me meanwhile, you know."

"Why not? It seems my best way of doing something in the world." "Why not? It seems my best way of doing something in the world."
"Well, you know best, no doubt—you know best. Only be anything but a doctor, that's all I say."

"La, Mark," said Lorry; "what, like the people when the judge comes in at Redchester? And shall you have to wear a wig?"

Any reply that her brother might have been going to make to these appreciative. Any reply that her brother might have been going to make to these appreciative remarks was interrupted by the arrival of one of the friends of the house—a managing clerk to one of the Denethorp attorneys, who, like his master in the old times, occasionally used to drop in of an evening to smoke a pipe with the doctor. He was rather a smart fellow in his way, and was publicly supposed to have half an eye upon Miss Lorry—perhaps he would have bestowed the other half also upon her had her fortune been equal to her merit.

"Ah, Brown," said Mr. Warden, "sit down, my boy. Mr. Brown—my son, from Cambridge." The two bowed to each other—Mr. Brown genlally, Mark stiffly, "And how are things going, Brown?" continued the doctor. "What's the news?"

news? Mr. Brown was certainly not "good style," and Mark had of late grown marvelously particular about such things. Besides, he had but just parted from Lester, whose style was undeniable. And so he did not go through his part of the introduction with a very good grace.

"Miss Warden," said the other, "delighted to see you so blooming. Sir, delighted to make your acquaintance—proud indeed. Johnstone's retired."

"What?" said the doctor; "madam going to throw up the sponge? You astonish me!"

"Sounds queer, doctor, don't it? But you don't know elections like I do. Be-tween ourselves, you know, it'll turn out a dodge."
"To put Prescott's people off the scent?"
"Maybe. But anyway, it'll be a dodge. "Maybe. But anyway, it it be a dodge. Catch madam asleep—catch a wease!!
Not to speak of White & Son. And I will say that for them, that no one ever caught the office napping yet. And there's something up—that I know for certain. You know young Lester?"
"Of course."

"Of course."
"Well, between ourselves, you know, it's a fact he came down by coach this very day. What do you think of that? Put two and two together—eh? I heard it from Sparks, who sat behind him all the way from Redchester."
"And what's he to do?"
"Why, stand! that's what he's to do. You take my word for it, madam means fighting; and I will say that for her, that when she means fighting, she fights, and no mistake. But won't the money have to fly, that's all!"
"I wish some of it would fly my way," id the doctor, meditatively.
"I'll fly every way!" said Mr. Brown, triumphantly. "Denethorp hasn't had such a chance this many a day!"

Malt Breakfast Food Imparts Health, Strength and Vigor to Nursing Mothers.

It has been most satisfactorily demonstrated that Malt Breakfast Food is the best morning diet for nursing mothers, as it provides ample nutri tion for the maintenance of health, strength and vigor, and wonderfully promotes the secretion of milk. Malt Breakfast Food, because of its many nutritive qualities and virtues is daily prescribed to nursing mothers by our best doctors. No other food is so easily and rapidly digested, and no other contributes so largely to comfort and happiness. Mothers with weak and capricious stomachs should give Malt Breakfast Food an immediate trial; it will quickly place them on the highway of health, give them pure blood and a well regulated nervous

A Scientific Voice Improver. Because of its strengthening influence upon the vocal chords, Catarrhozone cannot be too highly recommended as a wonderful voice improver. It almost instantly removes huskiness or horseness, thus insuring clearness and brilliancy of tone. Catarrhozone keeps the mucous surfaces in perfect condition, and its regular use absolutely prevents colds and throat irritation, thereby removing the singer's greatest source of anxiety, unfitness of voice.
