

American ownership of so much of our economy largely results from the operations of American multinational corporations. This gives us an intimate knowledge and special concern in this area. A very high proportion of our labour force works for American corporations; key decisions affecting our economic life are often made on your side of the border.

These are statements of fact, not complaints. Multinational corporations have brought to us a high degree of prosperity and a great fund of technology. But it is hardly surprising that a great many thoughtful and informed Canadians are concerned, nor is it surprising that the Canadian Government is preoccupied with the same question.

While our approach to foreign investment in general, and American investment in particular, is and will remain a positive one, Canadians are determined that foreign corporations shall serve Canadian interests, buttress Canadian priorities and respond to Canadian aspirations. In both our societies, new forces are coming into play -- a growing concern about the health of our physical environment, a search for new qualitative goals to supplement those that are more material, an urge to equalize opportunities and living standards in economies plagued by regional disparities. None of this is ever easy; in a federal state, it is particularly difficult, as you know just as well as we do.

These new aspirations, as well as basic national interests and priorities, must be taken into account by multinational corporations if they are to continue to have the high degree of freedom of action in Canada that they now enjoy.

In its economic policy, Canada is the most internationalist of nations. This does not imply abrogation of economic sovereignty, any more than our internationalist attitude in world affairs implies abrogation of our political sovereignty.

The nations of the world have learned that they can create international economic institutions to manage economic relations. I believe that in years to come we shall be able to develop existing institutions that try to harmonize power relations -- and find new ones -- to the point where the intractable conflicts that characterize our times will be capable of management.

We need new, more effective and more universal institutions in both the economic and political fields. I believe we shall find them, by the usual tedious process of trial and error. They will come into being in response to changing attitudes. If international institutions are to be effective, they imply acceptance by all states of limitations upon the exercise of sovereignty, of the forces of nationalism.

The trick is to differentiate clearly between essentials and non-essentials. Narrow self-interest and outmoded notions of sovereignty threaten world prosperity and world security today. If they are persisted in, the threat they pose will become more menacing.
