

Various skirmishes, and some disadvantageous actions, had followed his loss at Kolin. Gabel, an important pass, and well garrisoned with four bat. alions, under the command of Major-General Putkammer, situate between Bœnisch Leypa and Zittau, was surpris'd and taken by a strong detachment under the command of the Duke d'Arenberg and M. Macguire *. It was with some difficulty that Prince Henry, the King's brother, ordered with a detachment to watch their motions, escap'd their superior force †, which was afterwards vented with circumstances of most horrid cruelty against Zittau, a trading town in Upper Saxony, garrisoned by six battalions. Here were several large magazines also. They, determin'd to carry this place, before the King of Prussia could march to its relief, attack'd it with uncommon fury. They began to bombard and cannonade it on the 23d of July, without any regard to the Saxon inhabitants; and it continued with such rage, that all the garrison, except about 300 under Colonel Diricke, judg'd it most proper to retreat, with as much of the magazines, as they could carry off. Colonel Diricke had orders to maintain that post as long as possible. Which he would not give up till the whole place was destroy'd. The cannonading began at eleven o'clock at noon, and continued no longer than till five in the evening. But such was the quantity and kind
