ting the mind to a fublime spirituality, communicating the most enlarged views of the divine character and Providence, giving strength to support amid the most distresfing viciflitudes, and calming the breast which throbs with the anguish of guilt. Respon in fact operates a most beneficial change even on the intellectual condition of man. It strengthens his faculties. It enlarges his conceptions. It gives him clear ideas on the most fublime fubjects which can engage the mind of man. It supplies the want of outward comforts, while it expands the foulwith anticipations of future blifs. Even to the most wretched of our species, it points to a source of joy everaccessible. It furnishes objects on which the mind may dwell with fatisfaction. It dispels the gloom which encompasses furrounding objects, and leads forward to that world of light, where "we shall see face to face, and know even as we are known." It is in its applicationto fuch exigencies that the fuperior excellence of religion is best perceived. We know independently of experiment and fact, that religion is the most excellent thing and a fource of the pureft joy, but in the cafe of its alleviating actual fuffering, we see that it is fo. 'An argument' is furnished which comes home to every mind, and operates with a force which we may refift, but cannot overcome. The triumphs of divine grace are displayed and christianity is found to be indeed the friend of man.

IV. The exercise of brotherly kindness and charity is highly conducive to the happiness of man.—When we rejoice with those who rejoice," we participate in their felicity; nay, when we visit the house of mourning, to weep with those who weep," to soften the pillow on which the hoary head of age reclines, and to cause "the widow's heart to sing for joy," we cherish a tender pleafure, and share in those consolations which we impart to others. Benevolence, indeed, is so agreeable to the common notions of mankind, that every one condemns the mean and fordid spirit of that wretch whom God has blest with abundance and consequently with the means of bles-
