Lingan landing place. Mr. Lamond was "tipped off" late Saturday night, and lost no time in reaching Lingan, where the schooner was reported in the offing landing the stuff into dories. By the time the officer and his companions reached the place there was no schooner in sight, the vigilant smugglers evidently been made aware of the approach of the liquor squad. However, it is felt that the craft was successful in landing her whole cargo the rest having been successfully hidden away in some safe place.

From shortly after midnight till the grey streaks of dawn began to dispel the gloom, the liquor sleuths waited around the Lingan shore in the hope of coming across the smuggelers, but in vain. Then word was eiven the deputy inspector that the stuff, or at least a portion of it was carted to Waterford, and thither the squad went. Snow Men Discovered.

Wild snow men exist in the Hima layas and the tracks in the snow cf some of these men were discovered by the Mount Everest expedition. As a result of the publication of the infornation much comment and interest has been aroused in London among explorers who have been through the trails of the northern Himalayas, Several of them have written to London ewspapers corroborating the existace of these wild men, one former fficer in the Indian service declaring hat while journeying on horsebeck brough British Sikhim, at a height of bout 16,000 feet and resting his orse, he saw one. He declared him as about six feet tall, wonderful muscular development, very hairy and virtually naked in spite of terrific old. The snow man, according to th officer, carried a primitive bow and rrow. They are known to the Tiber
