Flitter the Bat When At Home

By THORNTON W. BURGESS.

When Flitter the Bat left Peter Rabbit he very quickly disappeared. You remember it was raining and Flitter was in a hurry to get home. Peter wondered where that home was. He hadn't the least idea where Flitter the Bat lived. He would have been considerably surprised if he had followed Flitter and seen where he went.

gave a funny little sigh. "I never was more hungry. And the youngsters are no better off than we are. They both gave up before I did and were here before I got home. But we are not the only ones in trouble. Mr. and Mrs. Forktail have had very little better luck than we have. I little better luck than we have. I have been listening to them over there on their rafter. It is a lucky thing that their babies are big of things. You don't hear those Bat children over there fretting and which, you know, is a kind of elastic skin. In his effort to get it thoroughly clean and to get at every part of it he looked sometimes as if he had. He of it he looked sometimes as if he had wrapped it right around his head. He combed out his fur. To do this he used the little hook on the top of each wing. These two little hooks made very good little combs. Mrs. Flitter did the same thing. When they had finished they yawned two or three times and then hanging heads down

"It isn't often that I envy anyone."
squeaked Flitter to Mrs. Flitter. "but just now I do envy those Swallows."
"Why?" squeaked Mrs. Flitter. "Because they don't need to wait until dusk before hunting for something to eat." reolled Flitter. "If it wasn't so very bright out there I wasn't so very bright out there I would be tempted to go out myself.
