In addition to this the outside walls were twenty-four inches thick, and the partition walls separating it from the rest of the factory were fourteen inches thick. The glass in the windows and door was fireproof. When Captain Jack Smith of the Yorkville-avenue section arrived a few minutes after he found that flams were confined to one small room. District Chief Smedley, who arrived a few minutes after, averred it was the greatest system he had seen for some time. "There's the steam in there," he pointed out, indicating the fire, "doing the work better than we can with our water. If we poured water in there the benzine would simply float. Even the concrete floor above this flat is not hot to walk on."

The fire was allowed to burn itself partly out, and then the firemen opened the doors, only to find that the room was recking with steam. All that the room, was seen shortly after the outbreak of the fire. He was trembling from excitement as he told his story.
