WILL CLEMENCEAU COPY NAPOLEON?

Foes Predict an Attempt to Set Up a Third Empire.

His Thumb.

Paris, Nov. 6. - Is Clemenceau aiming at a dictatorship? His enemies say he is. They think he has the stuff of a Napoleon in him; find extraordinarily striking points of resemblance between the two men, and they suspect a similarity in "What of Boulanger?" ask these same enemies "Had he blood royal? He had simply a sort of unaccountable magnetism and a dullish glow of military glory, yet see how far he went; he was very nearly the Man-on-Horseback of the popular legend, who is to ride some fine day into the courtyard of the Elysee and be the Ptolemy Soter of distressed France. now actually do, being grown great, for would strike higher up.

Had His Grip Upon All

There is no doubt that today Clemenceau rules France. Morally, he rules its individuals by the power of his great oratory; actually, he holds its supposed governors in his grip by sheer his disdain of all feebleness. Sarrien's whole cabinet was afraid of him; dreaded his sarcasm, his flouts of their their do-nothing arrangements for fierce anger; for he can storm on occasion like an angry boss of a gang of navvies. They dreaded his unabashed prying into their motives, into laissez-faire methods.

At a cabinet meeting Clemenceau al-Orrine is prepared in two forms. No. to keep awake. It is an old habit of 1, the secret remedy which can be used his to do most of his sleeping at odd in food or drink without the knowl- moments during the day, sometimes edge of the patient; No. 2 for those when the cabinet seemed to him to who take the remedy of their own free be driveling over unimportant measwill. Both forms are absolutely guar- ures, he closed his eyes and was away Treatise on how to cure drunken- to have blushed whenever the minister and paid off. There has been little work quite prevalent, but the general health

"We took advantage of a happy mo-ment," he answered. "We deliberately driveled until Clemenceau fell

A minister of the interior, as Clem enceau was in the Sarrien cabinet and continues to be in his own, inevitably exercises great control, even beyond the letter of his commission, over the whole mechanism of government through its personal elements Assistants, clerks, prefects, sub-prefects, mayors, and all their employes, he holds in the hollow of his hand, and those men carry the will of the Government into execution throughout the length and breadth of the land. Clemenceau holds them as never man held them before, except perhaps the first Napoleon To a man, in Paris and in Paray-le-Monial-as it were, in New York and in Podunk—the whole ad-ministration shudders at his nod.

Made the Dandies Work. Everybody knows how he castigated the dandies that used to lounge into the offices at the interior ministry at 2 o'clock in the afternoon to smoke a olgarette and swing their legs on the tables, exchanging political and social gossip of the town until at 3, when they passed out, having "earned" a day's pay, primed for the 5 o'clock tea of society. Clemenceau roared once, then set his famous lists of attendance fluttering through the rooms, and woe betide the elegant youth who was not there at 10 in the morning to sign. All are punctual now and work. The country's affairs are actually put through in reasonable time and the country's budget promises to be considerably lightened. The spirit spread from ministry to ministry. A ne breath of seriousness went through all the public offices of Paris. Incidentally the fame and the fear of Clemenceau spread throughout them all. He is the man who wills, and the nen that serve him respect and fear him and like to serve him whatsoever he may command, and follow where-soever he may bid them march. As in Paris, so in the far provinces. A prefect takes a pleasant little holiday, say, just a forty-eight hours' diversion in Paris, keeps discreetly aloof from the ministry. Yet he is exceptionally fortunate if he does not receive a message signed "Clemenceau," dated perhaps Paris, perhaps Aix-les-Bains, perhaps from his temporary headquarters on a speaking tour: 'Return or resign." He inevitably returns and does not renew the experiment. He is Clemenceau's man for the future. He reacts on the sub-prefect and the sub-prefect upon his subordinates, and at the end of the string the sweeperout of a country court sweeps for dear life as he never swept before, mut-tering, like the rest: "Better watch

Nobody can read Clemenceau's mind. He has ever been flery, ambitious, loving the battle, the danger spot, but he has always seemed honest. He is surely one of the most powerfully gifted men now playing a part on the world's stage — scientist, journalist, poet, novelist, scholar, connoisseur of art and letters, orators such as there are few in a generation, politician of consummate skill, good fellow when he

THE TOWN HEALTH IMPROVING

Cobalt, Nov. 6. - Sparkling silver everywhere, but not a grain unclaimed. That is a summary of the situation in this glowing Golconda, far beyond the uppermost of old Upper Canada. Yet this is the eleventh month of the year 1906—within which, so prophesied the arm chair mining critics, there would be a Cobalt mining crash that would ruin thousands of mad fortune hunters, and leave scores of ultra-optimistic investors without a dollar. The advent of Jack Frost, and the prospect of a characteristic winter, with an average of thirty or forty below, is having little effect on the permanent or floating population of Cobalt. As a general thing the people fade away from northern mushroom mining towns when the leaves turn, and drift in again with the robins. Not so the Cobalters.
