The Russo-Rumanians are now approaching the so-called lines of the Screth. These were constructed by Rumania when she was under German tutelage as a protection against a possible Russian advance from the north-east, and so they face the wrong way for the arresting of a German advance from the west. Rather, these lines, if occupied by the Germans, wilk provide them with an excellent defensive system against the coming allied attempt at recovering all Rumania. It has been established that the collapse of the Rumanian defence in the Vulcan Pass and at Craiova was entirely owing to a sudden and unexpected drying up of the Rumanian shell supply. This acci-dent compelled a retreat. Some resistance was offered before Bucharest, where the Rumanians doubless had a store of shells on the old peace basis, and when this was exhausted the retreat had to be continued. Only now is the supply of shells for the allies beginning to come in, and even it may not yet be strong enough to check the Teuton advance. yet be strong enough to check the Teuton advance.

* * * * * * * Low A key to the problem of the British losses in the Somme offensive has just been furnished by the announcement of the casualties sustained by the British army between Dec. 1 and Dec. 23, just made in London. The total for the first 24 days of December is 815 officers and 36,850 men, or a daily average of 1,548, against a November daily average of 2,488 and an October daily aver-age of 3,452. The losses reported in December bring the total between July 1, when the offensive began, and after it ceased till Dec. 23, to 520,017. When the offensive ceased the normal rate fell to 1,548 a day; so if there had been no offensive and this normal rate had obtained in the 176 days between July 1 and Dec. 23, the British losses would have been 272,448. As they were 520,017, the surplus above the 272,448 would roughly represent the maximum possible losses sustained on the Somme plus the losses in other theatres. The subtraction gives under 248,000. possible losses sustained on the source subtraction gives under 248,000.

By allowing for a higher average loss in the trenches north of the Ancre to Ypres from artillery exchanges and sniping during fine weather, and also something for the losses sustained in Macedonia and in East Africa, sick-nesses, etc., it will probably oe found that the total number of casualties sus-fained by the British on the Somme was between 200,000 and 225,000. The Germans, it is seen, for the sake of the effect on their own populace and on the United States, chose to double the British losses and to advertise their false figures widely in the United States to further their peace propaganda.

On the Russian front in Galicia the Germans appear to be firing great quantities of shell in daily bombardments. The Russians on their side carry out many trench raids when conditions are propitious. They are also de-pending upon the severe winter to cause multifarious cases of pneumonia to Wounded-John Britton, England, REGARD ALLIES' NOTE

The French record two attacks on their advanced posts in the Champagne esterday, after a violent bombardment with trench guns. The French drove ack the Germans by working machine guns and by hurling hand grenades. The artillery action became quite brisk in the night east of the Meuse, and Special Cable to The Toronto World. tary writers that altho the attack of the Teutontic allies has extended northward along the Moldavian frontier, the Russo-Rumanian troops at most points have held their ground.

The Town of Weston polled a very heavy vote yesterday for the municipal candidates, and the fact that a vote was taken on the hydro bylaw, which carried by an overwhelming majority, was the cause for great rejoicing in the town last night. There was no election for mayor and reeve, but all the other offices were keenly contested.
