THEFT MYSTERY IS CLEARED UP

Bank President Took $300,000 From Account of Miss Ellen Hunt—It is Said He Lost Most of it at Poker

Miss Ellen D. Hunt, of No. 42 East Fifth street, one of the wealthiest women in New York city, is the depositor of the Chemical National Bank who was robbed of $300,000 by the late Joseph B. Martindale, president of the institution at the time of his death, July 7.

The refusal of the officials of the bank to disclose the identity of the depositor whose account furnished the medium for Martindale's speculations has aroused the curiosity of the public as to who the person might be. Speculation along this line has suggested many names, chief among them that of the late Hetty Green, known to have been one of the heaviest depositors in the stock-riddled Chemical National.

The mystery is now cleared up as a result of an investigation by The Evening World. The investigation also seems to have produced the answer to the other question asked by friends of the dead banker who thought they knew him intimately—

"What did Martindale do with the money?"

The great American game of poker got the bulk of the $300,000 embezzled by Martindale. This is the explanation that comes from a source the authenticity of which cannot be questioned. The banker's incurable passion for poker and his seeming inability to hold a winning hand tells the story of what became of the money.

Martindale, one of the shrewdest men in the financial district, was little less than an "easy mark" when it came to gambling with cards, it is alleged. According to the best information obtainable, he knew practically nothing about the game, but despite this fact he went right along playing with a regularity equalled only by the consistency with which he lost. He thought nothing of betting thousands on a hand.

Men of his own exalted financial sphere were his companions in these games, most of which were staged in one of the big hotels not far from Fifth avenue and Forty-second street. Occasionally one of the big clubs to which the banker belonged was the scene of a card party.

"They were 'gentlemen's games' in the highest sense of the word, all the players being as prominent as was Martindale. But even 'gentlemen' are not averse to winning at poker. All these men quit winners at Martindale's expense.

It is the belief in certain quarters that Martindale's penchant for poker undoubtedly explains the character of his thefts. They covered a period of sixteen years, the amounts taken being frequently as small as $2,000. Why a man with his ample salary should have found it necessary to take such comparatively small sums has been one of the mysteries of the case.

Miss Hunt, the depositor whose confidence was betrayed by Martindale, is a woman past the threescore mark, who, despite her wealth, lives in comparative retirement in this city. She is a niece of Wilson G. Hunt, a pioneer dry goods merchant of this city and one of the founders of the Chemical National Bank. He left a fortune of several million dollars at his death, twenty years ago.

cutting depot as the one of yesterday. From nine o'clock in the morning until nine at night, when the armories were closed to the taking in of any more applicants, 500 men passed through the doctors' hands. Early in the morning, nearly an hour before the mobilization centre opened, twenty-five or thirty men were in line, and by the time the doors swung open at nine o'clock, more than seventy-five men were waiting admission to the medical men.

It was like an avalanche falling on the overworked officials of the mobilization centre. From the time the doors opened they knew no rest until nearly ten at night. The number of doctors was increased from ten to twenty in anticipation of the rush, and extra officers were on hand to handle the clerical work with the greatest possible expedition. In spite of all efforts scarcely any of the men who came up were able to get through the mill under two or two and a half hours.

Handling the Crowd

So soon as the men received their application forms they were lined up at the east end of the armories. Even though it had been announced that men would be examined at the depot without putting themselves under any immediate obligation of joining, many of the men were amazingly canny. The sergeant at the door of the armories was answering all day the question: "If we go up for examination now do we have to join right away?" The reply, of course, was

"No," but a great number evidently went on the motto of "safety first."
