OFFICERS USED AS SIGN POSTS

Hard Fighting Prevails in Galicia—Roads Hidden by Snow

Copenhagen, Feb. 5.—Winter has laid a firm hand on the south-eastern battle field, where the demoralized Austrian army is being crumpled in Central Galicia, where the temperature is many degrees below zero, the Russians are entrenched in the snow in far superior strength to the enemy. Henry Helsen, a Danish war correspondent of the Berlingske Tidende with the Austrian headquarters staff, wires today an interesting account of the terribly hard fighting conditions in this corner of the war theatre. Roads and tracks are hidden by snow, and the Austrian general staff are using officers as sign posts, stationing them at cross roads, bridges, rivers and in valleys. All ammunition and food supplies are dragged on sledges, and a constant increasing number of recruits are being trained in ski-running. Officers and men are unrecognizable in winter furs and hats. The cavalrymen, which for the most part is now fighting on foot, have discarded their famous red trousers for thicker and more clumsy garments usually worn by the infantry.

Feel Way With Ice Staves.

When troops are marching through the snow rife and swords are piled on sledges and men feel their way with ice staves. The correspondent adds: "I am telegraphing this from the front in Central Galicia. Field Marshal Asch, who has arrived from Lemberg, and his staff are quartered in an old cloister no longer inhabited by monks. At this part of the front the armies are interlocked. "The Russians tried some days ago to break through the Austrian lines at Lemberg, and the situation became very serious, but the Field Marshal hurried to the menaced point, where the Austrians already were retreating from their trenches, visited each trench, making flaming speeches to the men and his strong personality had such an effect on the soldiers that they ceased retreating and brought the superior force of Russians to a standstill, at any rate for the present."

Snow White Outposts

"In the Bukovina district there is an unbroken stretch of wire entanglements in front of the Austrian trenches over a distance of 100 miles. Outposts stationed every 30 yards along this vast line are wrapped in snow-white coats and hats, so it is very difficult for the enemy to distinguish them."

"The most recent fighting has taken place at night. The Austrians illuminating battlefields by burning innumerable stacks of straw, and the Russians reply with huge electric searchlights."

A builder's man was seen walking with his right arm raised above his head and slightly bent, as if carrying an object of some weight.

"What the dickens are you walking like that for?" asked the puzzled foreman.

"Can't I walk blooming well as I like?" replied the man.

"Yes, perhaps you may; but what about the chap behind?"

Turning, the workman saw his mate standing two yards in the rear holding his arm in precisely the same way.

"Well, I'm blowed, Bill," he said, after a moment's reflection, "we've left the blooming ladder behind."
