SYNOPSIS.

Susan Meyrick, the heroine of the story, returns home from school, and meets Sir Jasper Keith, the antiquated affianced of her sister Adelaide, (age 30 years) and likes him.

And with this answer Lady Keith was forced to be content and to possess her soul in patience. In due time, after he had had enjoyed six weeks of excellent shooting both of black game in the high ground and of partridges in the valleys, and after the harvest-home and its attendant festivities to the tenants had been brought to a successful finale, Sir Jasper set out in a calm and equable frame of mind for the visit which was to prove such an eventful one to him.

He met Adelaide again, proposed to her, and was accepted, and signified the fact by telegram to his mother two hours after the event.

As far as Adelaide herself was concerned, he did her no injustice at all. Adelaide was content to be in ignorance of the causes on both sides which had led to the engagement than was Sir Jasper.

Sir Jasper wanted to marry a handsome woman who would look well at the head of his table and carry the family diamonds with becoming dignity. Adelaide had no objection at all to be found seated at the dinner-table in Keith Castle, in the long banqueting-hall, with all the family arms and quarterings emblazoned along the dark oak panelling on either side of her; and she had moreover, the keenest desire in the world to wear the Keith family diamonds. It was a very fair bargain on both sides. She was a dowerless girl, whose face was strictly her only fortune, and Sir Jasper was wealthy. Adelaide neither objected to Sir Jasper's money nor to his person. She liked him, indeed, as much as she had ever liked anybody,—perhaps rather more. He was a good-looking man, with a tall and distinguished figure, he had a keen and clever face, and that easy self-possession of a thorough man of the world which is always attractive to the feminine mind. He would be a creditable husband from every point of view; and, as he was considered a "catch," there was in addition the secret delight of having secured him herself, over the heads of many of her friends and acquaintances who had exhausted themselves in vain efforts to attract his attention. In short, Adelaide was flushed with triumph, and her success made her at first exert herself to be pleasant and amiable to her lover.

She was not in love with him any more than he was in love with her, but that was perhaps because Adelaide was very much more in love with herself than she was ever likely to be with any one else. But, at any rate, she was perfectly satisfied with herself and with him.

But it is time to return to Susan. For after all, as I have said before, this is not the story of Adelaide, but the story of Susan.

Susan sat a long way from Sir Jasper Keith at luncheon at Raybourne that Sunday when they were all assembled in the dining-room after church. She was on the same side of the table, too, so that she had no opportunity of making up her mind on the knotty point of the color of his eyes, which neither she nor Clara had as yet been able to decide satisfactorily. Clara whispered an inquiry on this all-important subject in her ear whilst their father was carving the sirloin of beef, but Susan only shook her head and murmured her ignorance.

"I thought you would have been sure to find out, Susan," said Clara, reproachfully.

"I did not think about it," said Susan, and in her heart she felt convinced that she never would be able to look Sir Jasper sufficiently in the face to determine anything whatever upon the subject of his eyes; she knew, indeed that he had a charming smile, but that was a secret which she kept to herself and had not the faintest desire to share with her little chatterbox of a sister.

As soon as luncheon was over, Susan escaped quickly from the room; she was free now to follow her own devices, and her own devices led her to the stables.

Of all Charles Meyrick's daughters the only one who took after him self in his love of horses and of good horsemanship was his daughter Susan. Here was the one sympathy which drew the father and child together, and here lay the one great and exquisite pleasure of Susan's home-life. Hitherto, partly because she had been at school, she had had but few opportunities of pursuing her favorite pastime; partly also because, with an impoverished exchequer and increasing expenses, her father kept no superabundance of horses in his stable. He had his own two hunters, and there was a horse for the young ladies' use, on which Susan had enjoyed many a gallop during the holidays; occasionally, too, there was an animal of some sort belonging to Cuthbert; then there was the carriage horses, and the fat pony: that was all.

When Susan opened the stable door and found herself in the society of her equine friends and their attendants, she received the first true welcome home that had as yet been given to her. From Mr. Griggs, the old coachman, who had given her her first riding-lesson, down to the stable-boy who was filling the buckets of water at the pump, there was not one of the men whose face did not brighten at the sight of the young lady who was "so fond o' the 'osses."

Miss Susan was the only one of the young ladies who ever came into the stable or ever took any interest in the animals; the only one, too, who talked to the men pleasantly and kindly and knew all about their wives and babies.

Susan was completely happy as soon as she found herself in Rob Roy's loose-box, feeding her old favorite with a carrot, whilst Griggs took off the horse's clothing and called attention to his general fitness and beauty. Rob Roy was a handsome little bay horse with black points; he had good quarters and splendid sloping shoulders, and was a fine fencer. Being no longer quite so young as he had been, Rob Roy had grown clever. He was as steady as old Time, and had never been known to make a mistake across country. He was altogether about as safe a mount as a young lady of unbounded pluck but of little experience could possibly have.

"He's as fit as a fiddle, miss," said Griggs, admiringly, as Susan kissed her old friend's satin coat with enthusiasm, "and he'll carry you like a bird to-morrow. The hounds meet at the Swan Inn; and that's a nice bit of country for you. I've told your pa you'd best have your first ride on him to-morrow."

"Did you, Griggs? and did papa say I might go?" asked, Susan, eagerly, her face all aglow with delight.

The stable door had opened behind her, but Susan did not see who came in.

"Certainly, miss. Your pa he told me I was to bring him round with Fairfax and the chestnut 'oss what came yesterday of Sir Jasper Keith's and you are to go out 'unting with them."

"Oh, Griggs! it will be delightful to have a gallop again!" said Susan, breathlessly.

Then some one came into the loose-box behind her. The rustle of the straw made Susan turn round, and she found herself, to her surprise, face to face with Adelaide and Sir Jasper.

"I am afraid, then, my dear child," said Miss Meyrick, tranquilly, "that you will have to find something else to enjoy your gallop on to-morrow; for I happen to want Rob Roy myself to the meet."

Susan's bright color faded; her heart gave a great gasp, and then went down, down, into the very soles of her little shoes. When the family goddess expressed her intentions in that quiet and determined fashion, Susan well knew that to rebel would be in vain.

She was bitterly, and cruelly disappointed, but she only answered, quietly,—

"Very well, Adelaide."

Adelaide never hunted: she was not very brave on a horse, to begin with; besides which, she considered that hard riding coarsened the complexion. But now and again, when she wanted to show herself off or to meet somebody particular, Adelaide would ride to the meet on Rob Roy in the most faultless of London-made habits by her father's side, and would perhaps follow the sport decorously along the road for a couple of miles or so, in a gentle ambling canter. This it was that she had set her heart on doing to-morrow, not in the least because she cared about riding, but simply because she wished to show off her fine rich lover to the neighbors and to make the unmarried women all envy her good luck.

Jasper, who was standing beside her, watched the little scene between the sisters with secret indignation: he glanced from Adelaide's cold hard face beside him to Susan's little sad white one, upon which bitter disappointment was so plainly written; then he said, turning rather quickly to Adelaide,—

"Is there nothing else that Susan can ride?"

Adelaide shrugged her shoulders carelessly: there is nothing else, at any rate, that I can ride."

One of the men standing near said to her, "Miss Susan might perhaps ride Mr. Cuthbert's old 'oss, miss."

"Yes, of course. Why not? You can ride Cuthbert's horse perfectly, Susan,—Bring him round for Miss Susan, Griggs.'

"Beg pardon, miss," answered the old man, with decision, "but that there broken-kneed old crock, as Mr. Cuthbert picked up at a livery-stable for a ten-pun' note or so, ain't in any way fit to carry a lady: he have been going to the station in the luggage-cart, and that's about all he is fit for. It ain't safe for Miss Susan to ride him."

Adelaide turned away impatiently: "Oh, well, settle it as you like, Griggs. Miss Susan must stop at home, then. Anyhow, I am going to ride Rob Roy. Where is your horse, Jasper? I want to see him."

She went out of the loose-box, and Jasper, with a keen glance at Susan's averted face and quivering lip, followed her reluctantly. As he went, he heard the girl say to the old coachman,—

"I shall ride Mr. Cuthbert's horse, Griggs. For once it can't hurt me. I couldn't bear to be left at home."

"She is a good-plucked one." thought Jasper. "Poor little girl! what a beastly shame of Adelaide to take her away from her! Apparently my beautiful betrothed is not exactly the most unselfish and generous of women."

CHAPTER III.

Susan, in spite of Griggs's protest, rode her brother's "old crock" in the morning. He was a game old horse, and had evidently once been a fine hunter, but now, as the old coachman had said, he was certainly unfitted to carry a lady to hounds. Why Cuthbert had bought him was not quite clear: probably it was because, having broken his knees, he found himself compelled by his late owner either to replace him or to purchase him. At some remote period of his life he had probably been a very handsome animal, for he still had good points all round; but he was fit for nothing now but the shafts of a cart, and that was the use to which he had been put by Mr. Meyrick when his son had left him at the end of last vacation, without a word of apology, in his father's stables.

When he was brought round with the other horses, Mr. Meyrick was standing, upon the door-step, putting on his gloves with his hunting-crop under his arm.

"Hullo! what's that?" he inquired. "Who is going to ride that old horse of Mr. Cuthbert's?"

"Miss Susan, sir." replied the groom who was leading him.

"Dear! dear! this won't do at all! he isn't fit for her to ride."

"That is just what I says, sir," said Griggs, who was leading his master's best hunter, Fairfax. a handsome fleabitten gray; "but Miss Meyrick have ordered Rob Roy, and Miss Susan would have the Crock, sir. She says he's better nor nothing."

"Dear! dear!" said the old gentleman again, with vexation. "She ought to be riding Rob Roy. I said she should ride Rob Roy."

He turned round, and found his little daughter standing beside him in her habit.

"Adelaide wanted Rob Roy, father. Please let me ride Cuthbert's horse. I will be very careful."

"Why on earth can't Adelaide ride the Old Crock, then? She only wants to potter to the meet and back. He'd do perfectly well for her."

"Thank you, papa," said the cool voice of his eldest daughter behind him. "It would be really impossible for me to be seen on such a beast as that. Susan can stop at some if she likes."

Susan settled the question by walking straight to Cuthbert's horse and being put up on his back.

Mr. Meyrick looked annoyed, but a long experience had taught him that Adelaide always had her own way. Besides, Mrs. Meyrick, too, had come forth out of the house to see the party set out, and her soft yet decided voice murmured reprovingly in her husband's ear,—

"My dear Charles! On such an occasion how could dear Adelaide be seen on such an animal? Susan had much better give it up altogether, if Cuthbert's horse is not fit for her. Her sister must ride Rob Roy. Sir Jasper would be shocked if Adelaide were not properly mounted."

"What's the use of mounting her properly, when she don't know how to go?" muttered the down-trodden husband to himself, but he knew that it was useless to say any more. He was proud enough of his handsome daughter in a ball-room or at a London crush: that was her proper place, the sphere in which she really shone. "But in the hunting-field give me my little Susie!" he thought, as he gathered up his reins and swung himself into the saddle.

Suicide by a Dog.

The sight of a dog committing suicide was the entertainment furnished a lot of idlers in Columbus, Ind., the other day. The dog, a large white one, was standing in the middle of the Big Four railroad track on the Flatrock river bridge, and a freight train was rapidly approaching, but the dog lay down flat on his belly and the train passed over him, when he got up and trotted away. He soon returned, when another train came and found him standing facing it in the centre of the same bridge, but again he lay down on his belly and let the train pass over him. Again the dog rose up, and after looking around trotted away, but soon came back, and going out on the bridge made a spring and a leap directly at the wing wall of one of the abutments, which he struck with such force as to dash out his brains by crushing in his skull. The dog's peculiar actions were watched with interest, and it seemed as if he deliberately contemplated suicide.—Chicago Times.

His Father's Family.

General Booth has gone to South Africa, intending, it is said, to bring back with him a troop of Zulu recruits for the Salvation army. This is not good judgment. A detachment from the regular Salvation army would be much more likely to impress us. A circus manager who advertised, among other things, the largest giraffe in the world, pitched his tent in a country town and issued to the owner of the lot a free ticket of admission for his family. The owner gave it to his boy, who, collecting a group of his playmates, marched the whole crowd to the show. "Great Scott!" exclaimed the astonished manager, "are these all members of your father's family?" "They are," returned the veracious lad. "Pass in, then," he shouted. "It will be a darned sight more of a curiosity for my giraffe to see your father's family than it will be for your father's family to see my giraffe."—Brooklyn Eagle.

Ice Water—Doctors Disagree.

A celebrated physician says, "All ice water drinking is bad," also that "a severe blow upon the body," as the late Dr. PARKMAN, "which in good United States language means an important portion of the nervous system located just back of the stomach," "will cause almost instant death," and he further says "the sudden shock caused by a deluge of ice-water to the stomach has exactly the same effect upon the solar plexus as the blow, and may cause sudden death by its action upon it and through that on the heart." Another equally celebrated physician says, "Any diction which unqualifiedly says that cold drinks are bad and hot drinks are good cannot be shown," and further "cold water stimulates gastric secretion; therefore do not smile at your friend because he thinks a half-pint of ice water before eating gives him an appetite and helps his digestion." In continuation we will say, drinking ice water or copious draughts when over-heated is injurious, if not dangerous, that is undeniable. But that the free drinking of water in some form in hot weather must be avoided, is denied by no one of the greatest possible errors extant. When a person is perspiring freely, a vast amount of water is drawn from the body, which diminishes, if not prevents, great injury is being done the physical health and the foundation of some of the worst forms of Kidney disease is being slowly but surely laid. Do not drink ice-cold water, but pure cold water; a little lemon-juice will improve its effectiveness. Plain soda-water with a little acid is also excellent in hot weather. If from drinking too much ice-water you have stomach cramps, or are "watergogged" as it is called, or are attacked with Cholera morbus, Summer Complaint, diarrhœa or dysentery, do not resort to alcoholic stimulating drinks which irritate rather than allay the inflammation which has caused the trouble; but adopt the practice of taking, daily just before retiring, during July and August, one teaspoonful of Johnson's Anodyne Liniment in a little sweetened water, which will prevent all such attacks and ill effects from ice-water. In fact a little sprinkled sent free to any one by I. S. Johnson, & Co., Boston, Mass., contains a vast amount of information about treating those summer troubles with that good old household remedy.

Breaking the Running Record.

Lessive Phenix is the magic solutive before which all dirt and stains disappear. No woman who has used it would be without it. It is so effectual. It does so much. And does all perfectly. First, it takes the place of the common washing powders, with their injurious chemical properties. It makes the wash easy. You don't require soap, it makes the water soft, and it makes everything you wash as clean as a new pin, more, it restores faded colored goods. Try it upon your flannels, cottons, and anything washable.

A severe thunder storm passed over Truro yesterday. A colored boy, eleven years old, named Taylor, was killed by lightning, and several houses were struck.

A Prevalent Malady.

Mrs. Smith—Why Mr. Brown, I am surprised to see you at the reception this evening after what I heard yesterday about your ill health. You appear to have had a very slight shock.

Mr. Brown—Slight shock? I do not understand you, madam.

Mrs. S.—That is strange; perhaps there is some mistake; but I certainly heard Mr. Jones say to my husband that when he saw you the night before you were paralyzed, and that it took two men to assist you home.
