lack of money that they imagine it is that which draws the caste line, and having missed it most in the matter of dress, they spend their lives in a frantic effort to hide such lack. At least that is the charitable construction to put on the anxiety which women of even more than average intellect follow the mode, to which men of a like grade are indifferent. The first effect of the Proclamation of Emancipation on the negro women was universally to incite them to get a dress like their mistress's, "to be even with white folks;" but to them also we will believe the silk was only the symbol of equality and freedom.

In these October openings we learn that a picture-sque simplicity is the highest rule. Furbelows and paniers have vanished, and the scanty plain robe clings to the lovely figure close as the falling lotus leaves to Clytic's bosom. The mass of dead women's hair is gone from the

What does this portend? Is it only a new vagary?—the usual disgust of the fashionable leader at the aping of her follies by yet more foolish country people and servant girls, and her consequent retreat into a region of chaste simplicity? Or is it a symptom of a general reaction of the country from sham into common sense? If it be the latter, this feeble sign will doubtless be followed by others. It is but the twitter of the single swallow, but afterward comes the whole Summer. Reform in dress will only precede reform in furniture, etc. The dry goods or pork merchant will not labor under the conviction that a palace modeled after Apsley House, carpets from Persian looms, or coat and waistcoats like Disraeli's Young Duke, will make him more of a man. The grocer will not plenish his house as though he were a millionaire, nor the carpenter feel that life's best aims are fulfilled in cheap Brussels on the floor, and sleazy silks and plumes upon his wife. Pulpit eloquence will drop its sensational trickery, and deal with the terrible problems of commonplace life. Popular literature will no longer mean claptrap, popular piety cant, nor popular statesmanmanship a talent for money-making. But until these later signs appear, we are not sanguine of the Summer, in spite of the prophecy of this single swallow. Iron, Steel, Files, &c In Store and landing :
