Having regard to the immense popularity of "Red Pottage" not surprising that the author of it has taken years in the writing of the present novel, which follows it. The publication of this book will undoubtedly be awaited with great interest by the author's readers, and the Publishers are convinced that it will make a deep impression on all who read it. It is a love story cleverly constructed, it has a good plot, some intensely dramatic situations, many interesting character studies, and above all a heroine who is very human and whose character the author has studied and delineated with the greatest possible success. The scenes are laid first in Italy and afterwards in England, and the story is concerned with the consequences of an early love affair being revived by the heroine after her marriage, of her relations with two half-brothers, of whom one is sacrificed. The reader is held to the story from beginning to end and it gives the author the opportunity for the display of that strength in her writing which has made her name famous.
