Color Characteristics.

By RUTH CAMERON.

Did it ever occur to you that colors have characteristics just as people do? It seems to me that they have. For instance, don't you think that this Kelley green that we see so much of nowadays is a smart color. I always associate smartness with it just as I do with some people. When I passed a shop window yesterday with a display of Kelly green veils and shoes and stockings, the impression I got was one of smartness just as if I had met a smartly dressed woman.

Dark blue is a quiet, refined color. Like quiet, refined people, it does not obtrude itself upon one's consciousness and yet always leaves a pleasant impression. Neatness and simplicity are also associated with dark blue. It is a tailor-made color. There are probably more plain tailored suits of dark blue than all the other colors put together.

Red, it seems to me, is a friendly, cheerful color. There is a certain cordiality about it like the glow of an open fire. Of course, different tints and shades of the same color do not have the same characteristics as the basic color, indeed their characteristics may be as far apart as the poles. There is nothing the least smart about a good old-fashioned red, but there are certain shades of red such as lobster and cerise have as blatant a smartness as Kelly green. Again, red has no suggestion of def-ance about it, but its first cousin, scarlet, is distinctly a defiant, flaunting color.

Then, take the different feelings you get from the different shades of pink. Old Rose is distinctly old-maidish and old-fashioned. There is a deadness and primness about it. Shade off into coral and you get a gentle, thoughtful color, with a touch of quaintness to be sure, but with no flavor of age or primness. Shade again into pink and you get a color with all the characterless sweetness of youth.

Pink and blue are distinctly young colors. They belong to children and young people and they somehow suggest the youth, innocence and sentimentality of young folks.

Black is peculiar in that it does not seem to have any invariable characteristics of its own, but takes its character from the wearer. Perhaps this is because it is not a color, but merely the absence of color and hence its negativity has to be made positive by that with which it is associated. Black may be sad; it may be dull and unobtrusive; it may be dowdy; or it may be smart and stunning, according to its association.

Colors ought to be studied by every woman who wants to be really well dressed, for the relation of a color to the person who wears it is an important factor in making a costume successful or unsuccessful. Colors can be becoming or unbecoming, not only to complexions but to personalities. Every woman has certain colors which belong to her either by the right of harmony or of contrast.

What are your colors?
