indignation as I saw you sitting so quietly, so unsuspiciously, and that coward drawing his gun upon you behind your back, on the very soil of Miraflores!"—he saw the flash that came into her eyes at the recollection. "I fired, and I was glad to see him drop. Yes; I could not have believed it, if I had been told of it beforehand, but I was glad! The horror of what I had been forced to do did not come over me until I saw the poor creature bleeding to death. Then—oh, then it was awful? I do not think I can ever forget the sight!" indignation as I saw you sitting so quietly,

As she lifted one hand, with an involuntary gesture, to her eyes, as if to shut out the memory, he took the other and kissed it, the hand that had saved his life, so gently and so reverently that it was like offering homage.

"What can I say?" he exclaimed. "To spare you such pain, I would have done anything. Would to God I had never come to Miraflores, since my coming was to cost She withdrew her hand and looked at him with a sweet and pathetic regard. "You must not think that," she said. "I should be very sorry if you believed that I regretted it. How could that be possible? It was a great privilege to be allowed to interpose to save the innocent from the guilty. But that I am a little unnerved is surely natural. The peril was so awfully near. In another instant it would have been you who lay bleeding, dying, before me. The piteous sight of the other helps me to realize that. And then, while I thank God that it was spared, the picture of the poor wretch yonder in the hospital comes before me, and I shudder at the thought that he is suffering, that he will die, from a wound inflicted by my hand."

He saw that she was indeed thoroughly unnerved. Something in the tragedy had certainly stirred her nature to its depths. The fire that he had suspected was there, he had seen it blazing in her eyes as he stood with the uplifted weapon that had struck the destroyer down, but how soon it was quenched by gentlest pity and divinest was guenched by gentlest pity and divinest.

The fire that he had suspected was there, he had seen it blazing in her eyes as she stood with the uplifted weapon that had struck the destroyer down, but how soon it was quenched by gentlest pity and divinest compassion! His heart melted within him in the stress of his love and sympathy. Yet what could he say or do? Never had he felt more keenly how wide were the barriers between them than as they stood alone together in the soft twilight and the cloixtral quice.

"I feel for you more than I can or date."
