Helen did not answer; she sat down on the other side of the fire, and leaned her head upon her hand. The dark cloud of melancholy hovered over her-for the moment the young sunshine was gone. It was a dult routine—a laborious life—cheered only by the special inheritance of fair and gracious things when her her own spirit, and sometimes the cloud overshadowed even these.

He was still in the shadow, and while he could observe every change of her features, she could scarcely see the dark glow of pleasure which covered his face.
"But, Helen, you think of fame—and I will never win fame; hundreds fail every year of acquiring the mere standing ground. Is it worth hazarding quietness and peace, and giving up home as I shall do, think you, for the chance of such distinction—only small distinction, Helen—as I can ever reach?

But he seemed more inclined to listen than to speak.

"I grant you that," said William; "but suppose, He en, a man should distrust his lown powers, and to think it most expedient to keep himself apartfr mall struggles—to withdraw far away from the evils he has not strength to contend with—what then?"

"are donning masculinity, not only in their garments, but in their ideas; they want to vote; they are beginning to believe more in certain fanciful 'rights' than in their children; they are acquiring mental lengthed at the expense of heart knowledge at the expense of heart affection." Where is the proof of these re-markable statements? Ordinary observa-tion shows that the fashion of wearing yests, cravats and mannish-looking shirts is as common among weak minded as among strong minded women. As for donning masculine ideas, that would be as difficult masculine ideas, that would be as dimented a performance as swimming in a masculine lake, building a masculine house or eating a masculine pie. Ideas are sexless and free to everybody. They are also capable of being assimilated in large quantities by the human mind, whether that mind tanness to be encased in a male the human mind, whether that mind happens to be encased in a male or female body. Any kind or amount of knowledge which is acquired without injury to health is a strength and enrichment to the feminine nature. Knowledge is not acquired at the expense of heart affection—it is acquired in most instances at the expense of pocket money. It would be an insult to college-bred men to affirm that their iove of their families and homes was less ardent than the love which laboring men and artisans give to their wives that their love of their families and homes was less ardent than the love which laboring men and artisans give to their wives and children. Nobody asserts that men are "acquiring mental knowledge at the expense of heart affection." Yet the rule should work equally well in both cases.

The entire acticle appears to be based upon the apprehension that if woman takes one single step in the direction of progress that step will land her outside of the sacred sphere of home, the front door of which she will slam with a viciousness that will make every peace-loving husband shake in his shoes. And this in face of the multitudinous facts which prove that the beat homemakers in the country are the so-called "advanced women." Such a woman applies to domestic difficulties the same intelligent attention and cultivated reasoning power that she formerly brought to bear upon her studies. She is not a door mat in her own home, nor is she a family donkey. Least of all is she a doll. But by every degree in which her own mental life has been broadened and bettered is the life of her family broadened and bettered is th

Her pulse began to beat more quickly—
Strong in those young warm veins of hers ran the tide of her ambition.

"I do not mean distinction—that is," said the truthful Helen, who feet that in some degree she did mean it, "I mean things graver and nobler before distinction. I think the old chivalry will never die out of the world, William; to be a kuight—to carry arms against all the powers of evil—to win new lands to acknow-edge our king—whatever we have to work as if or our bread, that ever we have to work as for our bread, that ever we have to work as for our bread, that ever we have to work as for our bread, that even we have to work as for our bread that even we have to work as for our bread that even we have to wor It is always interesting to observe a man laboriously stoop down and carefully chalk out a circle large enough in his opinion to include more than half the human race, and then say, "There, now, all you ladies just siep inside of that, and don't let me hear another chirp out of any one of you." But the trouble with Mr. Bok's circle is that it's too small for even a single self-respecting woman. "The average man," he says, "would much rather that his wife nestle close to him, and ask him to advise her, than that she should strut around his house in an assertive manner, and lay down the law to his children and his servants." His house, you observe, his children, his servants. What belongs to the wife? Nothing apparently except the proud consciousness that she is standing inside of that dear little chalk circle. This is the sort of sentiment that we cannot choose but call the wishiness of washiness. But we have heard it designated as the boshiness of Bokkyness. ess of Bokkyness.
