"Practice makes perfect," laconically "Practice makes perfect," laconically observed Miss Starkey, but with a gratified look at the compliment to her skill. "Now, Annie Noble," she said, resuming her seat by the bedside, "I've got a story to tell you, if you are able to hear it, and I guess you are; at any rate, I can't keep it any longer; it's been aching to be told these two weeks. Your mother's name was Annie Hunting?"

"Yes," Annie replied, as the woman revered on instant but regarding her with

"She was the daughter of William Hunting, and he was my mother's only brother, which made her—your mother—first cousin to me—"

first cousin to me—"
"Why! Miss—"
"Hold on till I get through," interrupted Miss Starkey, her eyes shining, her cheeks scarlet with excitement. "She—your mother—was ten years younger than I, and she was a pet and plaything for me when she was a child, and I loved her dearly for years. Her father and mother died when she was a little girl, when she came to live with us, and she was one of the sweetest, daintiest girls was one of the sweetest, daintiest girls you ever laid eyes on, and every year only made her more so. Now comes the tough part of my story, child, and I hope you won't blame me any more than you can help, because the human heart is a more than a sometimes." weak thing sometimes.'

Miss Starkey paused a moment as if to collect herself, while Annie was ac-tually speechless at what she had heard, hough now she could account for many nings that before had seemed very "There came a time," Miss Starkey resumed, "when my feelings changed to-ward your mother though it was through the fault of hers. Adrian Noble, your father, came to Starkeyville one summer, and we both became acquainted with him at the same time. I don't doubt you will nink me a silly old woman for living all these years on a single dream of my youth"—Miss Starkey was very pale now and her withered hands were trembling with nervousness and emotion—"but I'm going to tell you the whole truth—though not a living soul besides myself everknew about it—Adrian Noble grew to be more to me than any other object in the world. I was years older than he; I was yea just what I am now—rough, homely, awk-ward Martha Ann Starkey; but for all that my heart was as loving and tender as other folks', and I just bowed myself down to him and worshiped him. Then came the tug-of-war! Of course, he didn't care a fig for me. How could he? You know what he was—a proud, cultivated gentleman, who could have chosen the fairest lady in America, and I was no more fit to mate with him than I am to be mistress of the White House to-day. fust what I am now-rough, homely, awk-

"I used to think it was hard, unjust," "I used to think it was hard, unjust."
Miss Starkey, interposed, in a halfplaintive tene, and with a far-away look in her eyes, "for the Lord ever to put body as mine. I knew when anything was beautiful. I loved pretty things, tender words, and sweet sounds just as well as other folks, but somehow everything I said or did turned out like myself—all awry and out of tune. self-all awry and out of tune "Why, I could never even speak like anybody else—everything came out sharp and pert—though my heart has been ready to melt when what I've said sounded the worst. My cousin was as different as black is from white—'sweet Annie ent as black is from white—'sweet Annie Hunting,' she was called—with her pretty face, her dainty manners, and smooth, educated talk: for, while I was making butter, washing, ironing, and cooking, she was always poring over books, making pictures and nice little things for herself and the house. When I would stutter and stammer, and turn as red as a beet if anybody spoke to me, she would be as easy and sweet and calm as a May morning. It is no wonder then that be as easy and sweet and calm as a May merning. It is no wonder, then, that Adrian Noble loved her—that she won the heart that I would have given half my life to wir. I tried to bear it and let it make no difference in my feelings toward her, but I couldn't; it wasn't human nature when soul and body were being torn asunder. He married her and carried her off to his city home, and that pwful feeling of jealousy that I couldn't get rid of crept in between us, though she was just as sweet and gentle as ever. I knew I was a fool, but that didn't make my trouble the easier to bear. I never would go to see her. I never asked her to come to see me, and it was only when I heard that she was dead and gone where I never should see her sweet face when I heard that she was dead and gone where I never should see her sweet face gain, that I woke up to the fact that I had been breaking the Lord's commandments all those years, besides gorely wronging the dearest girl in all the world. heard that a little child had been born, but whether it lived and thrived we never knew. After she died I made some inquiries, but all I could learn was that Adrian Noble had shut up his home and gone abroad, and that was the last I heard of him until I read of his death in a newspaper.

"I couldn't help it, dear," she said, apologizing for her apparent weakness; "I must give up a little, for it upsets me to think how near we came to losing you entirely, and just as George Washington and I had made up our minds to take real solid comfort with you."

Annie looked the wonder she felt at this enigmatical speech, but Miss Starkey said she must have some nourishment right away to restore her strength, and hastened out of the room to prepare it, and without giving the fair invalid an opportunity to ask her to explain what she had said.

She soon returned with a steaming bowl of beef tea and some delicately-browned toast, and sat watching with evident satisfaction while Annie disposed of the whole with unmistakable relish.

"Why, I feel almost ag good as new," she said, as she passed the bowl back; "and you do make the most delicious beef tea."

"Practice makes perfect," laconically of him until I read of his death in a newspaper.

"You can imagine that I was somewhat taken aback when I came here, four weeks ago, and found out who you were. You could have knocked me down with a teach pour told me your mother's name was Annie Hunting and your after you. You were dainty, and sweet, and gentle, like her; but I wasn't going to own you, nor tell you were made of. I've expected that George Washington would blurt it out, for he has near about lost his senses over you; but I've managed to make him hold his tongue pretty well.

"Now you know, little chicken," she fair face on the pillow, "what I meant the other day when I asked you how you'd like to have a good, comfortable home, where you needn't work for your living, but have all the nice things that young girls like.

"George Washington and I have talked"

"George Washington and I have talked it all over, and we thought it would be nice to have you with us. It would sort of liven us up, perhaps, to have a bright young girl in the house, and make us forget, now and then, that we are getting so old; while we hoped, also, to make life a little easier for you. We knew, of course, it couldn't last very long when course, it couldn't last very long when we found out you were going to marry young Waldemar; but we'd be thankful for a little, and then I did feel kind of chipper that we could help to settle you nicely, and give you a good, sensible outfit when you were married.

"Now you know all about it, child. We had planned to tell you the story last night, but, of course, we forgot everything eise when you were in such danger. You have wedged yourself into our old hearts since we have been here, and we long to have you love us a little bit; for we are two lonely old folks. I have almost felt as if I had my own dear little Annie back again—as if she had forgiven me for all my unkindness and jealousy, course, it couldn't last very long when Annie back again—as if she had forgiven me for all my unkindness and jealousy, and taken me back into her love once more. And since you are the child of those two I loved best in this world, I—I feel as if—I had a sort of right to you. How does it strike you, dearie?"

The woman, in her eagerness, fell upon her knees beside the bed, leaning toward the lovely girl lying there, the tears rolling over her wrinkled face, and a pathetic heart-hunger looking forth from rolling over her wrinkled face, and a pathetic heart-hunger looking forth from her eyes.

Annie had been weeping quietly for some time. The story had been told in plain, homely terms, but it had touched her very soul. She could imagine something of what this strong, true woman must have suffered in those years so long ago, when she had given her love and all the best of her nature to the silent idelatry of a man who was so the silent idolatry of a man who was so far above her, socially and intellectually, that she could never hope to win one thought from him in return.

"How many heart-tragedies there are in life," she thought, remembering Miss in life," she thought, remembering Miss Waldemar's early disappointment, and knowing too, something of Grace's recent sorrow and struggle.

She slid one white hand into that of the kneeling woman and clung to it with a fond clasp.

"Don't cry, child," said Miss Starkey, tenderly; "perhaps I should not have told you how I cared for your father; I wouldn't, only, somehow it seemed to give me a double right to you. Dry your tears now, and tell me if you're willing that George and I should claim you for the little while longer that we're willing that George and I should claim you for the little while longer that we've got to stay in this world. I know we're rough sort of folks, There an't no frills nor polish about us, but we've got true, honest hearts, both of us, and—we are kind of hungry for a little love, besides what we've got for each other."

Annie put up her disengaged hand and drew that earnest, wistful old face down to hers, and kissed her upon the lips.

"I think it is just lovely to know that there is anybody in the world who really belongs to me, and who care; to claim me," she said, tremulously.

"I believe," she added, after a moment,

"I believe," she added, after a moment "that the ties of kinship have drawn m toward you from the very first; and no to know how you have loved both par and mamma, makes me love you dearly and mamma, makes me love you dearly. You are really my second cousin, I suppose, but I do not want to call you cousin—it seems too formal. May I say 'Aunt Martha,' and 'Uncle George'? It will make you seem a little nearer, and sound better, too, I think."

Miss Starkey's lips quivered so that she could not reply at first. She folded her arms about the young girl's slight form, and drew her close to her, holding her so for a solemn minute or two.

her so for a solemn minute or two.
"Child," she said at last, "call me any thing you like. If I could only hav known about you during these years the known about you during these years that you have been sewing these pretty fingers off to earn your bread, how happy I could have made your life. We, George Washington and I, have plenty of this world's goods, and it'll all be yours after this; but it is a pity that you couldn't have had the head it when you readed.

had the benefit of it when you needed it most."
"Never mind that now, Aunt Martha." Annic said, with a sly smile at this first use of the new name: "I imagine it has been good for me to know something of the trials and troubles of life. I used to be a very headstrong little girl, and I needed something to tone me down a trifle."

McCLARY BASEBALL TEAM WON CITY CHAMPIONSHIP

Defeated Londons in a Double-Header at Tecumseh Park Yesterday.

The McClary baseball organization are champions of the city for 1902. They won both games at Tecumseh Park yesterday and thereby practically won the coveted championship. Gate receipts were light in the morning, and had London won the morning game there would have been no game to play in the afternoon. The morning game which was won by a score of 8 to 7, started well for London. Stein was hit by the pitcher, but was caught at second. Sippi, on errors, got to second and was followed to second by Ashplant, the two of them being brought in by Bell's drive

The McClarys made their first runs in the third, when after two men were out, Gibson and Delaney got to bases on an error and a hit by pitcher. Each stole a base and came in on Peacock's Carroll made a pretty double in the seventh, Wanless fanned and Sheere put a nice little drive, good for a base, into the right pasture. Jackson made a balk, after which a little drive by Sippi to left brought Carroll and Sheere across the rubber.

The eighth inning was the inning in which McClarus was the inning

The afternoon game was actually a repetition of that of the morning, Mc-Clarvs stretching out in one inning. when least expected, and running up the tally in a monotonous manner. London made two runs in the first and third, but did not score afterwards. McClarys scored first in the sixth inning, their vigorous tally good for seven runs being made in the seventh. As in the morning, a few errors on their own part and a few hits on their opponents', seemed to throw the Londons out of working order. They worked hard to redeem themselves. however, but failed. The Londons did exactly what was expected of them yesterday, winning the Argonaut game by a score of 6 to The game on Carling's Heights showed that the local team is the strongest and best, and that the confidence felt here in them was not wrongly placed. The Argonauts were not as strong as when they played London in Toronto, while London, on the other hand, was considerably stronger. They went into the game feeling thoroughly sure that they would win, and the same idea was entertained by all who knew the composition of the two teams.

The improved condition and better playing of the home team, as compared with that shown at the Toronto 11. game, was very excellent. Hardly any time was lost by accidents. As a matter of fact, while the game was principally a test of strength and endurance, there was extremely little rough play on either side. The work of the referee, S. C. Mullins, of Toronto, and of the umpire, Mr. McLaren, also of Toronto, was very fair and satisfactory. The game was attended by a large crowd, eleven or twelve hundred peo-

London's scrimmage and wings were both stronger than theirs, which meant a big advantage in a game such as this was, when there was comparatively little open play. The Toronto men played heroically, but they could not get results. Their stubborn fight in the second half prevented London from increasing the score, but it did very little for themselves. It was fortunate that London scored their six points in the first half. Magnificent work was done in the first by the two new-comers, Meredith and Bice. They, however, were not in condition, and were not able to keep up the same fast gait they set in early part of the game. Their work was the feature of the game, theirs and Sippi's. They put up a splendid game to do when they get into trim. The team work altogetner was admirable, and as usual, Jack McNee, in particular, distinguished himself. He engineered a number of successful moves, which Forneri cleverly assisted him in carrying out.

Two chances which might not occur again in a lifetime gave the Argonauts and official acts to bring about their two points. In the ordinary settlement of the controversy. He course of events they would have been | said: shut out completely. They were lucky enough quite towards the close of the second half to get two free kicks | dent in the coal strike, but I say to each from the 25 yards line, and were you that it is too late to complain able to force rouges. Just at this time it had looked serious for London, as play had been dangerously close to goal territory. In several instances good work on the part of Stirling and Little prevented Toronto scoring.

The teams were: London-Full back, Stirling; quarter, McKay; halves, Mc-Nee (center), Little (right), Forneri (left); wings, Meredith, Kerrigan and Fields (right), A. Bice, Black, Regan and Sippi (left), and Taylor, Lucas and G. Bice, scrimmage. Argonauts—Ridout, Bomwell, Dudley, Ryan, Heimber, McIntyre, McNichol, Duggan, Kent. game as they were yesterday. They weeks, and some good practice should | Hatteras. be got in in the meantime. There is no doubt that London has the strongest team this year that it ever had. The teams they are playing are stronger, better and more experienced. The Argonauts are a sample. The teams which London has beaten this year could easily defeat the teams that were the championship possibilities of a year or two ago. The result vesterday inspired the people here with the belief that the London team of this year is going to repeat the successes of the past.

It should be remembered that the London juniors are to play at Carling's Heights with Petrolea tomorrow afternoon. The game will start at 3:30, and promises to be very interesting. The younger players should be encouraged by a big attendance.
