Therein, however, she greatly miscalculated. Bower divined her thought almost before it was formed. "For goodness sake, let us put things in plain few friends," she said. "I cannot let her go in anger."

"She is unworthy of your friendship," exclaimed Bower sharply. "Take my advice and forget that she exists."

"You cannot forget that she exists."

"You cannot forget that anyone exists, or has existed," said Spencer quietly.

"What? You, too?" said Bower. His eyes sought the American's, and flashed an unspoken challenge.

He felt that the world was a few hundred years too old. There were historical precedents for settling affairs such as that now troubling him by means that would have appealed to him. But he opposed no further hindrance to Helen's departure. Indeed, he perceived that her meeting with Millicent would provide in some sense a test of his own judgment. He would soon learn whether or not money would prevail.

He waited a little while, and then sent his valet he the check and a request for an acknowd grment. The man brought him a scribbied note:

"Was rather taken aback by appearance of H. She says you told her I was leaving the hotel. We fell on each other's neck and wept. Is that right? M. J."

He cut off the end of a cigar, let the paper with a match, and let the cigar with the paper.

"It does," he said. "I have been arguing the pros and cons of a ticklish problem. There are two courses open to me. I can either bribe you or leave you to your own devices. The latter method imples the interference of the police. I dislike that. Helen would certainly be opposed to it. I make the one thousand into five; but I want your answer now." "I accept." she said instantly. "Ah, but you are trembling. Queer, isn't it, how thin is the partition between affluence and a prison? There are dozens of men who stand high in commercial circles in London who ought to be in jail. There are quite as many convicts in Port-

He cut off the end of a cigar, let the paper with a match, and let the cigar with the paper.

"Five thousand pounds," he said to himself. "It is a lot of money to one who has none. I remember the time when I would have sold my soul to the devil for half that amount."

But that was not a pleasing notion. It suggested that, by evil hazard, some such contract had, in fact, been made, but forgotten by one of the parties to it. So he dismissed it. Having disposed of Stampa and Millicent, practically between breakfast and lunch, there were no reasons why he should trouble further about them. The American threatened a fresh obstacle. He was winning his way with Helen altogether too rapidly. In the light of those ominous words at the luncheon table his close association with Stampa indicated a definite knowledge of the past. table his close association with Stampa indicated a definite knowledge of the past. Curse him! Why did he interfere?

Bower was eminently a selfish man. He had enjoyed unchecked success for so long a time that he railed now at the series of mischances that tripped the feet of his desires. Looking back through recent days, he was astonished to find how often Spencer had crossed his path. Before he was four hours in Maloja, Helen, in his hearing, had singled out the American for conjecture and scrutiny. Then Dunston spoke of the same man as an eager adversary at baccarat; but the promised game was arranged without Spencer's co-operation, greatly to Dunston's loss. A man did not act in such fashion without some motive. What was it? This reserved, somewhat contemptuous rival had also snatched Heien from his company many times. He had undoubtedly rendered some service in coming to the Forno hut; but Bower's own remotest hint on your part of any scan-dalous knowledge affecting me, or Helen, or the causes which led to my present weakness in allowing you to blackmail me, will imply the immediate issue of a war-rant for your arrest. Need I explain the position at greater length?"

mannered, alert youngster from the New World did not seem to care a fig for any prior claim on Helen's affections. His whole attitude might be explained by the fact that he was Stampa's employer, and had won the old guide's confidence. "Yes, the American was the real danger. That pale ghost conjured from the grave by Stampa was intangible, powerless, a dreamlike wraith evoked by a madmore than she counted on. "I have tried to avoid the appearance of uncalled-for rudeness today," she blurted out man's fancy. Already the fear-engender-ed myopia of the morning was passing from Bower's eyes. The passage of arms with Millicent had done him good. He saw now that if he meant to win Helen he must fight for her.

ing to the Forno hut; but Bower's own lapse from sanity on that occasion did not escape his notice. Finally, this cool-

"Well, yes, What is the number of your room?"

She told him.
"I shall send the check to you at once. Have you finished?"

He accompanied her to the door, bowed her out, and came back. Smiling affably, he pulled a chair to Mrs. de la Vere's side.
"I quite enjoyed my luncheon," he said.
"You all heard that stupid outburst of Millicent's last night; so there is no harm he must fight for her.
Glancing at his watch, he found that the time was a quarter to three. He opened a window in his sitting-room, which was situated in the front of the which was situated in the front of the hotel. By leaning out he could survey the carriage stand at the foot of the long Millicent's last night; so there is no harm in telling you that she regrets it. She is leaving the hotel forthwith."

Helen rose suddenly. "She is one of my debts with my money?"

He still hated her for having dragged him into a public squabble. He looked to the future to requite him. A year, two years, would soon pass. Then, when funds were low and engagements scarce, she would appeal to him again, and his solicitors would reply. He caught himself framing curt, stinging sentences to be embodied in the letter, but he drew himself up with a start. Surely there was something very wrong with Mark Bower, the millionaire, when he gloated over such paltry details. Why, his reflections were worthy of that old spitfire, Mrs. de Courcy Vayasour.

worthy of that old spitfire, Mrs. de Courcy Vavasour.

His cigar had gone out. He threw it away. It had the taste of Millicent's cheap passion. A decanter of brandy stood on the table, and he drank a small quan-tity, though he had imbibed freely of champagne at luncheon. He glanced at a mirror. His face was flushed and care-lined, and he scowled at his own ap-parition.
