Dr. Alexander Andover threw himself into the big leather covered chair before his office fire with a weary sigh. He was a fine looking man of 30; not handsome, but noble and manly looking-one to be trusted forever, with his broad, white brow and grave, clear grey eyes. His lips too, under the full brown beard, were as fine as a woman's, without lacking in strength and firmness. Dr. Andover's patients-especially the poorer class and children-turned to him instinctively for advice and sympathy. He was one of those grand, kingly natures which seem made for leaders and comforters. Poor old Betty Cary, a bed ridden paralytic, could not speak of him without shedding tears of gratitude. Little Jane Ellis, suffering with an incurable hip-iace down to his own. was one of those grand, kingly nature Ellis, suffering with an incurable hipdisease, looked upon him as a sort of good on earth. There were a score more who

But fate had lately frowned upon him. In the first place, the bank in which the greater part of his snug little fortune was deposited had failed, and directly upon this came the news that some mining stock in which had been deposited by the stock of the same below to the same below to the same mining stock in which had been deposited to the same mining stock in which had been deposited to the same mining stock in which had been deposited to the same mining stock in which had been deposited to the same mining stock in which had been deposited to the same mining stock in which had been deposited to the same mining stock in which had been deposited to the same mining stock in which the same mining stock in the same stock i this came the news that some initing stock in which he had invested was worthless, or nearly so. The doctor did not fear poverty himself—his practice brought him a comfortable income, for the rich appreciated him as well as the poor—but miles away in a distant city there was a lovely girl whom he had hoped to call wife by Christmas time. A girl who, though not wealthy herself, had been extravagantly educated by her uncle, in whose luxurious home she lived. He knew that not the slightest privation had ever come to her; was a petted darling with hands like a baby's. He had never questioned if the knew anything about work—the idea in connection with Maud Everleth was absurd. He had been able to take her to a

but that was gone now.

Lovely, dainty, useless, as she seemed,
Dr. Andover had poured the whole passion of his great heart upon her; and you are not to think him weak because just at first, when the news of his ill-fortune came to him, he shrank and trembled under it, thinking of the girl he loved; for he must give her up. There was no doubt in his give her up. There was no doubt in his mind about that. He could not ask her to share the fate of a poor physician who de-pended upon his fees tor a living. He even pended upon his ices for a hying. He even smiled grimly in the midst of his sufferings at the thought of Mand in a calico dress, mixing up bread or washing dishes with her white, slender fingers, which he had only seen toying with her fan, working at embroidery or dashing over the keys

So Dr. Andover had written her a brave farewell letter just a month before the of his altered fortunes and releasing her from her engagement to him, and he had eived no answer, although it was now

Christmas week. The doctor was worn out with exposure to rough weather and many sleepless nights.
The demand upon his time and strength had been greater than usual, yet he had replied to them all, never failing in kindly courtesy beside the couch of Betty Cary

It was Christmas week, and Maud was to have been his own next Friday night. This thought tortured him unceasingly, together with some words in a letter which ter from an acquaintance who was visiting in the city where Maud lived.

"I met your 'fiancee' at a party last evening," he had written, "I admire your choice. She was the brightest, loveliest there, and the most graceful dancer."

Dr. Andover experienced a cruel sense of desolation as he turned that sentence over and over in his mind. Maud had not loved him after all. She could be gay and bright when they were forever separated!

The office fire smouldered to asnes, and still he sat there, still and sad, until from The office fire smouldered to as nes, and still he sat there, still and sad, until from sheer exhaustion he fell into an easy slumber. About midnight he awoke, alternately burning and shivering, while a dull pain throbbed in his temples.

The doctor's apartments were commodious and comfortable. A large chamber opened from his private office, which latter pened from a large receiving room. He was his own patient now, so he hastened to bed; and when his landlady came half delirious.

Christmas morning came bright and frosty—a day after St. Nicholas's own heart—and the doctor, a trifle better, although weak and languid, opened his eyes to close them again immediately with a little pang. This was to be his wedding day! He could hear the merry sain in the morning to call him, she found him tations on the street, the clash of sleigh bells, and the pealing organ from St. Paul's church over the way, and the sunlight and mirth and gladness made his own pain seem the keener—just for a moment, until his generous heart could gather strength to reassert itself and be glad because others

Many of his grateful patients had remembered him with some little Christmas token, and Mrs. Derby had placed them upon a stand at his bedside, but now she held in her hands a small packet addressed to him in a familiar lady's hand and registory.

"Joseph Marmaduke Mullally, how dare you, sir!" exclaimed the indignant

Maud had returned the engagement ring. Dr. Andover received the package in elence, and Mrs. Derby looked at him with a craesfallon expression.

"I thought you would be pleased, doctor. I've come to knew Miss Everleth's handwriting, you see, and I supposed she had sent you a Christmas present. This package came two days ago when you were delirious, and I signed the registry card and made bold to send the lady a telegram more common blood humors. notifying her of your illness. And, Dr. Andover, can you bear some pleasant news? I received a telegram in return stating that Miss Everleth would start at once to come to you. Now that is the nort of girl to make a man a good wife. She will probably be here to day."

To day! Dr. Andover listened to kind Mrs. Derby in bewilderment. What did

With trembling fingers he tore the wrapper of the tiny packages and opened a jeweler's case. There upon its bed of purple lay a gold finger-ring, extraordinary wide, the inside of which was completely cowered with fine lettering. And Dr. Andover read slowly through blind, rapturous tears the words which had arise in the heart of the girl who proved herself worthy of him, when his letter had come to her after many weary days of delay:

Well, when I got your letter, I took that gold to a jeweler and had it made into a ring. And then after I received Mrs. Derby's telegram I made uncle promise to bring me to you at once. I would have come alone if he had not come with me, horrible and unconventionable. unconventionable as my fashionable friends would have called me. friends would have called me.

Aunt Alice never negl the most important part of my education, and I am sure I shall make a most excellent wife for a poor man. That is, Alexander"—and here she flushed up gloriously nome as fine as the one she would leave, _''if you will have me.' Dr. Andover smothered the last words against his shoulder, and as soon as she ould free herself from his anceremoniou embrace she began anew to coax and wheedle him into some new plan of her own, to which he at first objected, but finally yielded. The result was that at 5 o'clock that afternoon Mand Everleth was made Dr. Alexander Andover's wife and at once asserted her authority by taking upon her the duties of a nurse. Of course, under such treatment, he recovered rapidly, and every day grew to appreciate more and more the loyalty and worth of the sweet little woman who had not failed him in his dark hour. * * * Delicate diseases radically cured. Consultation free. Address, World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, that will not be mistaken for a pincushion Mrs. Derby slipped out of the room, crying herself, at the sight of Dr. Andover, usually so calm and strong and self-possessed, crying like a 2-year-old baby over Maud's Christmas token.

It was nearly noon when Maud herself came. She had removed her wraps in Mrs. Derby's room, and, after a light tap on the sick man's door, she entered.

Alexander Andover had thought her lovely in her exquisite party and carriage and home toilets; but never had she seemed so sweet and gracious and womanly as now, when, in her plain gray traveling costume, her lovely face a little pale with weariness and excitement, her mouth tremulous and her dark eyes glowing with a solemn light, when a person bites into it.
