SCARCITY OF WATER. If the teetotaler has a bad time in busi-

If the teetotaler has a bad time in business, he does not have a good time when he is playing. The happy English countryside is no place for the teetotaler, if he is thirsty. Everybody who does not wish to drink beer, clder or standygaff knows the difficulty of getting anything to quench his thirst when on a bicycling or walking tour in England. Milk and soda may be at once ruled out, for milk is more difficult of acquisition in the place where it comes from than any other country product, except, perhaps, fruit. Lemons from a hundred score miles away may occasionally be found; and there are mineral waters, which certainly include stone bottle ginger beer; but whose thirst has ever been quenced by this compound of sweetness and effervescence? Water, that is to say, water of the very best quality, is what the thirsty traveler really wants; and water is what he cannot get.—London Chronicle.
