Dodie was hopelessly silent, of ccurse.
"Oh, Letitia, I thought you promised me a season of rest," protested Miss Carlyon, plaintively. "Art and philosophy have no part in the sum and substance of my existence for the next seven days. Miss Winter," to Dodie, "did you do that exquisite embroidery yourself! Would it be asking too much to show me how?"
Dodie was herself again, and Granville experienced a sense of gratitude, while Letitia, knowing her friend's opinion of needlework, as applied to her own case, looked first amazad, then a triffe abashed.
