AVIATOR ROBINSON'S STORY.

LONDON, Sept. 6.

(By Lieut. W. L. Robinson.)—"I had been up something over an hour when I saw a Zeppelin. She was flying high. I followed and climbed to get a position above her, but in the heavy fog she escaped me. I fired at her at long range, but she made off before I could see if any damage had been done. I determined that the next ship I saw I would attack from the first position I found. I met her just after 2 o'clock. Soon she appeared to catch fire forward in her petrol tank. The flames spread rapidly along the whole body. She made off to the eastward on fire. In a few minutes she dipped by the nose and dived slowly to earth. I was so pleased that in my excitement I looped the loop several times, and then showed my signal to stop firing and came back."

My sister here made some allusion to the fine, and expressed a belief that if I were liberated that would be paid. Oh (said the Judge), a fine is no punishment, the rabble would pay that. The Judge in the most feeling manner regretted that he could not accede to my sister's solicitations, and the utter impossibility of rendering me any relief unless upon the conditions he had named, dwelt on the respectability of my family connections and bility of my family connections and the gentlemanly conduct which (he the gentlemanly conduct which (he said) general report attributed to me, and concluded by telling my sister that if I would give up the author of the paragraph for which I was committed that he (the Judge) would release me that very night before he slept. Let your brother (said His Honour) give me the name of the writer. It cannot be known for some time I am going away, nothing can be the conversation. I have extenuated nothing, I have set down naught in malice. If I have erred it is by making a subject public which perhaps was never meant to be other than strictly secret. But as I was in no way party to the Exile of Siberia appeal taken up in my behalf, but extremely chaprined when I heard of it, because it is evident from the tenor of the conversation that the Judge suspected me to be privy to my sister's applications. I have no hesitation whatever in giving it publicity and at the same time to take the blame (if there be any) upon myself. Of Mrs. Boulton's observations I do not intend to speak, courtesy to the softer sex and respect for her, forbid animadversion. I may, however, be permitted to say that the tenor of her remarks go not to throw magic relief between those sterner possessions which but too often obscure the finer emotions of the female heart and that sympathetic tenderness and benevolent feeling which contribute the greatest charm of a lovely woman:—

I many instances the vertuated nothing the work of sure the form, thank God, I have had the fortiment, thank God, I have had the common enemy and maintain my characted. I have worsted all—dupt

By the light quiv'ring aspen made, When pain and anguish wring the brow A ministering angel thou."

If in this instance Mrs. Boulton forgot what was due to feminine delicacy, it is pardonable, and I forgive her, she is not the first woman who erred. Heaven in its wisdom decreed it so, but also "maketh a way to escape." Mrs. Boulton is likely to have her own share of the bitters of this world and Providence has filled her with a stern nature to repel them. The Judge's observations aim at two things—first, an ardent desire to possess the name of the person who wrote the paragraph which offended him; the next wish which appears uppermost in his mind is that I should become the willing instrument of, my own degradation, by betraying a sacred trust and thereby attach to my own name the eternal stigma which is justly affixed to the man who demeans himself to become an informer. I had been in confinement nearly three weeks when this conversation took place, and the anodyne the merciful Judge would apply to my lacerated feelings was to add to all the

His Honour said "the rabble" were other sins, he has imputed to me, ar buoying me up with false hopes of infamous betrayal of trust and sacrifice for him a fresh victim upon the remuneration for lost time and in-jured health, but declared his (the Judge's) conviction that I would nev-profligate counsel I was to be respectable" part of the community.
Alas, if I shall not be entitled to the respect of the Judge and the "respectable" part of the community until I have done that which would make me contemptible in my own eyes I fear I shall never be very high in their regards. And if their respect (a fat something I suppose) is not to be obtained but by vicious conduct I despise it. I am not only importuned to tell the writer but the price upon that information is the relinquishment of my native land forever. Heaven, can it be possible that a Judge could advise me to commit an Judge could advise me to commit an act which would render it necessary that I should quit the land of my birth to become a renagade to principle and honour and virtue, to be despised by my enemies and dreaded by my friends, to lose that which I would not barter for ten times the value of the Judge's possessions or value of the Judge's possessions, or even for life itself. Did the Judge suppose for an instant that his friendship and respect were so highly valued by me that to obtain them not only would I commit a breach of faith but I would also forget the insults he heaped upon me, where in his official character upon the bench and I at the bar humbly attempting to de-fend myself from the charges he was urging against me, if so he calculated without his host. The friendship of Royalty itself would be too dear a such a price. It cannot be hid from the dullest perception that the Judge sighs to lay his hands upon some one else, he disclaims any hostile feeling yet his cry is for another victim Mark the manner, the snake-like man-ner, in which he wished to elicit from me some imaginary personage. "I may be drowned," said he, "and there will be nothing about it." Thus quieting the pangs of dishonor with the probability of it never becoming also said that he neard that peritons were being got up against himself, but he cared no more for the rabble and their petitions than he did for the barking of a little cur in the barking of a little cur in the street.

I have endeavoured in the above report to maintain the substance and in many instances the very words of the conversation. I have extenuated conversation of the conversation of
