SPECIALIST SAID HE MUST OPERATE

She Took "FRUIT-A-TIVES" Instead, And Is Now in Perfect Health.

MME. F. GAREAU

153 Papineau Ave., Montreal.
"For three years, I suffered great pain in the lower part of my body, with swelling or bloating. I saw a specialist, who carefully examined me and gave me several tonics to take, which did not help me. Then he told me I must undergo an operation. This, I refused to permit. I heard about 'Fruit-a-tives' and the wonderful results it was giving 'because this medicine is made from fruit juices, so decided to try it. The first box gave great relief; and I continued the treatment, taking six boxes more. Now, my health is excellent—I am free of pain and swelling—and I give 'Fruit-a-tives' my warmest thanks."

From Want To Wealch

By Caroline Hart

wide bands of otter: on her large head was perched a small hat formed of the same fur; and she wore a coquettish veil.

"Well, mamma, I've heard all the particulars," she exclaimed; then catching sight of Alice, who was folding some article of dress, she added, laughingly, "I wish to speak with Mrs. Clifford leave the room."

Scarlet with indignation, Alice obeyed, her, and just at the door she met Mr. Clifford, who said "good-morning," gravely, and then entered his wife's room.

"Why have you been out so early?" he asked his daughter in a tone of displeasure.

"Because I wished to verify my suspicions regarding mamma's angelic maid," replied the young lady, sneeringly.

"Have you done so?"

"I have. I have visited Mme. Du Crow, and it seems that she felt uneasy after the girl left her house to come here, so she sent to the address Miss Innocence had, given her to inquire about her. She was not known there; but a girl with whom she was slightly acquainted did live in the place, a low tenement house; madame's messenger saw this girl, and our golden-haired beauty has just come out of a reformatory where she was placed by her mother, who is a serious woman for the public school-houses," said the heiress, coolly.

"Well, the girl never said she did not come from a reformatory, did she?"

"Not that I know of. She is mamma's protégée, not mine," replied Alice, spitefully.

"No, I would never think of accusing you of having one," replied her father.

"Well, it is better to keep clear of such people, as I think you will admit."

"I do not know what crime the young girl has committed, beyond riding to and from Mrs. Bradley's house in the cab with Nellie, and after all she could not have compelled him to ride in the same cab with her if he did not want to."

"So you defend her?" cried Miss Clifford, angrily.

"I don't think she requires any defense. Nellie tells me he was in the cab before the girl came out of the house in the first instance, and that she did not know how to get home in the second; he adds that she is as modest and ladylike as she is pretty."

The dark face of the heiress grew a dull crimson.

"There, you see, my dear," said Mrs. Clifford, gladly, "you have been making mountains of mole-hills in your usual impulsive fashion."

"I detect the girl, and shall not have her enter my room," replied Alice, solemnly.

"She need not; we go West at three o'clock," spoke up Mr. Clifford, "so, if you want a maid, find one before then or go without. I think, myself, that you are old enough to put on your own clothing."

"Too angry to reply, the young lady rose, and dashed, or rather stumbled, out of the room, banging the door behind her as emphatically as if she had not received an European education."

"Delightful temper!" remarked Mr. Clifford.

"My dear," said his wife, in gentle expostulation, "you really care for Alice so little that no one would imagine she was your only child."

"Sometimes I fancy she is nothing to us," replied her husband. "Alice does the thought never occur to you that the nurse, whom we ascertained afterward, had been insane, stole our little one away and put this girl in her place? It has to be thousands of times, when I have in vain searched for one point of resemblance between your face and hers."

"Impossible!" she said, doubtfully.

"I do not know; what impresses this idea more firmly on my mind is the fact that this girl is really vulgar in thought and manner."

"That nurse disappeared, too, very strangely," murmured Mrs. Clifford, thoughtfully.

"Just so; we never could find a trace of her. I'd give half I am worth to find out that low-bred girl was nothing to us."

"Oh! Hush, Edward; she may be our child; but I must tell you one circumstance which I never revealed to you. I knew the nurse years before; she was a fellow-student of mine at college, and she conceived a deadly hatred for me, because she loved one of the professors, and grew insanely jealous of me. I did not recognize her when I first saw her in the West, she was so terribly changed."

"There!" exclaimed Mr. Clifford, "that supplies the motive for such a mad action as I suspect she was guilty of. Did she know you? Was the recognition mutual?"

"Yes; and she begged me not to mention that I had formerly known her; she said she did not wish people to know that she had formerly been in better circumstances."

"If we were not going West to-day, I should be tempted to insert an advertisement for that woman," said Mr. Clifford, musingly.

"Can you not do so in any case?" asked his wife, eagerly.

"Yes; and give her our address in St. Paul, or get Mr. Partridge, my lawyer to attend to it."

"Well, dearest, see to it after breakfast."

Mr. Clifford and his wife were served in their apartments; but that day Miss Alice did not make her appearance, sending a message by the waiter who informed her that breakfast was on the table, that she preferred to breakfast in her dressing-room.

She sat there looking sullen as a thunder-cloud; on the table near her stood a traveling dressing-case and desk; the latter was open, and the young lady was examining a bundle of letters.

One of them she frowned over as if its contents gave her displeasure.

"It is safer to burn these," she said, "but what does it avail me? I can not escape her. I should like to murder her. I believe that this is the very girl, too; what evil chance brought her here?"

Suddenly coming to a fresh determination, the heiress sprung up and threw the bundle of letters in the fire, where they were speedily reduced to ashes. She seized the poker and pushed them out of sight as the waiter appeared with her breakfast on a large silver tray.

"Call a cab for me in half an hour," she said, seating herself.

"Yes, miss."

"And send that girl here—my mother's maid—tell her I wish to see her at once."

Alice was surprised when she received the message, but lost no time in obeying the young lady's command.

She knocked at the door, and Alice Clifford bade her enter in a more polite tone than she usually wasted upon a dependent.
