Who Told Berlin?

William Le Queux, writer and novelist, writing to the Daily Sketch on the subject, says:—"It is to be hoped that the authorities will now at last awaken to the fact that Germany possesses some very rapid and secret mode of communication between London and Berlin, a truth which I have several times endeavored to point out. The tragic end of Lord Kitchener once again reiterates the peril. The first news of the disaster was issued by the Press Bureau at two p.m. on Tuesday, and instantly the evening papers gave the news to Great Britain. Yet within sixty minutes the same news was actually being distributed by Berlin! Now in peace-time an ordinary message, even one of those with the red docket gummed to it marking it as a government message, would take long or longer to reach the German capital. The Germans have some secret mode of communication which our intelligence department—excellent though it is—has not yet discovered! A leakage, and a very serious leakage, apparently from some official quarter somewhere, has been in progress ever since the war began. Berlin knows what is going on in London before the man in the street knows!"

"I've just had a letter from my son to say he was won a scholarship. I can't tell you how pleased I am."

Char-lady: "I can understand your feelings, mum. I felt just the same when our pig won a medal at the agricultural show."

Met Death in Kennebecasis

Miss Constance McGivern Drowned When Canoe Upset, Despite Heroic Efforts of Companion, Third Officer Johnston of S. S. Caraque.

The entire community has been deeply grieved by the death of Miss Constance McGivern, who was drowned in the Kennebecasis on Saturday afternoon. A bright young lady with a winning personality, she had hosts of friends throughout the city, and the sympathy for her relatives in their sad bereavement is as sincere as it is widespread.

Miss McGivern left St. John with a party of friends on Saturday afternoon by the suburban train bound for an outing at Mr. DeVeber's cottage on Mathews Island. From Rothesay the others proceeded in motor boats, while Miss McGivern and Third Officer Johnston of the West India steamer Caraque started to cross the river in a canoe.

The voyage was made in safety until they were about opposite the point known as the Minister's Face. Then a squall struck them and, in the heavy sea which arose suddenly, their frail craft was swamped and the occupants thrown into the water. After vigorous efforts Mr. Johnston and Miss McGivern succeeded in righting the canoe but could not empty it of water as the waves were breaking over it. Mr. Johnston then placed his companion across the craft and started to propel it by swimming behind it. This proved too difficult to promise success and he suggested that he swim to shore and seek assistance. Miss McGivern was a good swimmer and was confident that she could make the passage and insisted on accompanying him. Soon after they had started Miss McGivern became exhausted and then took a cramp. Her companion went to her assistance and tried to carry her along, with the waves breaking over their heads constantly. Finally the burden became too great and they sank. Mr. Johnston brought the young lady to the surface and insisted on accompanying him. Soon after they had started Miss McGivern became exhausted and then took a cramp. Her companion went to her assistance and tried to carry her along, with the waves breaking over their heads constantly. Finally the burden became too great and they sank. Mr. Johnston brought the young lady to the surface and insisted on accompanying him.

After a period of unconsciousness Mr. Johnston recovered and made his way along the shore until he sighted some of the party who had returned in a motor boat to look for the missing members. By the use of the semaphore system he signalled his arms that Miss McGivern was drowned and then collapsed again. The others hurried to him and, after the doctor of the Caraque, who was with the party, had revived him, Mr. Johnston told the story of the tragedy. Hurrying back to Rothesay, Dr. Peters was summoned to aid in the care of the exhausted man, who did not fully recover consciousness until ten o'clock at night.

In the meantime, the news had been telephoned to the city and Commissioner Russell sent out a party of men with grappling irons to look for the body. Grappling was started on Sunday morning but weather conditions made it impossible to continue and the men stayed over night to resume work today.

Miss McGivern was about twenty-two years of age. She was the only daughter of Mrs. Emma Louise and the late Richard McGivern, barrister, and was her at one time harbor master of the city. J. S. McGivern and George McGivern are uncles, and Miss McGivern is an aunt of the deceased. Her mother and grandmother are still living. She was an active member of St. John's (Stone) church, and a teacher in the Sabbath school. She was a member of Loyalist Chapter, I. O. O. F., the Young Women's Patriotic Association, Women's Canadian Club and the St. John Tennis Club.
