wise speaker knows that illustrations are so effective as mose, which have to do with familiar, every-day objects. In this respect the Great Teacher set an example to all who might follow him. How an itinerant preacher in the Tennessee mountsin profited by this example is nariated in the American Missioners.

The discussion was joined in on either side by those around, and is was finally decided to leave the question to the preacher. He was cylied in and the case stated.

"Look yer, boys," said he. "S'posin' a man comes along here with seven hand-some gray horses, e-ridis' one and the others a-follerin'. You all like a pretty beast and you like 'em all over. You can't see that one is better than another. They are all as pretty critters as ever were seen among the mountains though there will be differences in horses, boys. When you come to know 'em, ne two is alike. Well, that man says, 'Here, boys, I'll just give you six of these beasts for your own,' and he gets on the other and rides off. I s'pose now you'd mount your horses and ride after him and make him give you the other horse, or at least let you keep it till your crops was all in."

As We Grow Old.

One of the first surprises that people have as they begin to realize that they are leaving the record of a goodly number of years behind them, is that people think they are old. Casual remarks to that effect made before them come as a distinct shock. The epirit does not grow old; it is merely hampered by physical infirmities, and more particularly public opinion. People are made old; they give upyouthful practice, because people think they must, though that was more in the past than in the present. There is no doubt that people cial traveller from Liverpool, who was in traveller from Liverpool, who was in the present. particularly public opinion. People are made old; they give upyouthful practice, because people think they must, though that was more in the past than in the present. There is no doubt that people women particularly, lost much of their physical force because as they gree older it was "proper" for them to give up this and that and settle down. Now that grandmother lides the bicycle, things have changed somewhat. Almost anyone can remember, as a child, wondering how it would seem to be very told—in the child's estimation, twenty, thirty, even forty years have passed, the child, who has become a mother, looks back and thinks that she feels little older and surprisingly little wiser than that child.—Rev York Times.

You often see beautiful fruit displayed behind a plate glass window or in some shop, and the hungry little boys look and long for it, but they cannot reach it. If you were to tell one of them who has never seen glass to take some, he might attempt it; but he finds something invisible between him and that fruit. Just so many Christians can see that God's cifts are beautiful, but they cannot take, because the self-life comes in between, even though they cannot see it. What glorious blessings we should have if we were only willing to give up the self-life and only in the long they cannot see it. What glorious blessings we should have if we were only willing to give up the self-life and only righteonances, not only peace, but the joy of the Holy Ghost.—Rev. Andrew Murry.
