

him, but the won ler all was when thequiet, un. stentations remarks of his political vis a vis, Mr. Fraser, as they proved such food for wonder to the spectators in the galleries.

That too was insulting to the the members of the North-the charge that Mr. Sayre had been beught. To overshoot the "north" mark once should have been enough for Mr. Blair. Altogether then the only men among the opposition worth as many beans as their number, are Blair, Willis, and Covert. Davidson, whose fine abilities Blair thought he could command, never by word or action gave grounds for that belief no more than did his very able and very learned colleague Sayre.

Then look at the Government side. From what we have heard of Mr. Wedderburn, we are impressed that for graceful, sarcastic and thrilling eloquence he has no peer perhaps in the House, certainly not in the Opposition. Mr. Landry is one of these quiet men, who takes galleries by surprise, and with one broadside puts his enemies hors de combat.

We have already referred to Mr. Frazer in his summary disposal of Mr. Blair's broadside. And while having no personal experience of Mr. Adams' speaking powers, the records of the house tell a story, that among parliamentary debaters, he can take a foremost stand. And in this connexion, we can't omit the name of Mr. Davidson, who fully makes amends for any slowness of speech by a clear head and nicely discriminating mind. And the very smoothest. the most flowing of the orators,we will not say the most oily of The Government may count on becomes, let their faith in his support increase. It would give us great pleasure to see him made Minister of Education, his former calling fitting him so eminently for the position. Against all these we put Willis, Butler, Covert, Cottrell, and that's about all-except Blair.
