

His Mirror Told Him of Exhausted Condition

Mr. R. Paulin, Tontes Aides, Man., writes: "I became so run down and weak that my heart became affected, and I would sometimes have to remain in bed for several days. Some one advised me to use Dr. Chase's Nerve Food, so I did, and soon began to gain in weight and feel better. I have taken a great many boxes of these wonderful pills, and am feeling ten years younger. Dr. Chase's Medicines, as well as his Receipt Book, are a great help to us, for we live 40 miles from doctors and railroads."

LORD MORDEN'S DAUGHTER - OR - THE TRAGEDY OF THE CEDARS.

CHAPTER V.

He half turned, then said, in confusion: "In the meantime I will find out all I can concerning the Mordens from the private memoranda I always carry with me, and be back in an hour's time. By the way, you have not told me the name of the old sea captain whose injuries you attended to at Deal."

"I saw no necessity for mentioning names, lest that everlasting memorandum book of yours came out. The gentleman's name was Deane, sir—Captain John Deane."

The viscount hurried from the piazza without a word, his face a picture of astonishment and perplexity. "So this is the person who desires the information, is it?" he muttered, under his breath.

Having reached his own room, he took a letter from a small, strongly-bound leather handbag, which was sufficed with manuscripts and papers of all kinds, and read as follows:—

My Dear Melville:—The news you have gathered has quite unmanned me, and I shall never forgive myself to my dying day. Come back to the "Cedars" without delay, if you have no further inquiries to make, and induce my son to return with you. It is only natural that he should be annoyed with me for maintaining so long a silence upon a subject which touches him so closely, and I believe that it will be best to tell him all, but will do nothing incompatible with your wishes. One of the conditions should be his consent to wed Lady Clare Moncrieff, and a definite date fixed for the ceremony. This dilly-dallying has been going on too long already I wonder that Lady Clare is so patient with him. Keep me alive to your movements, as I feel altogether unfit for any more surprises. Your grateful friend,

NORMAN LOCKSLEY.

Melville read every line thoughtfully, then he paced the floor for half an hour. And while he was so engaged, Edmund sat puffing at a cigar on the piazza below, alternately thinking of Dora Deane and Lady Clare Moncrieff, whose letter lay open on his knee. "It will be all right between me and Lady Clare," he mused, "if other people will keep their fingers out of our pie." He frowned a little, and picked up her ladyship's letter again. This is a copy of it:—

Darling Edmund:—Your dear papa has requested me to bring you to the point, one way or another, and if you are in a marrying mood, why, the sooner we relieve the minds of our respected parents, the better. For myself, I am in no hurry, but expect to get settled some time, of course. It is annoying that people will not let us alone, but we must follow the dictates of custom. A woman on the shelf is a nonentity, or I should tell you candidly that I would much prefer to be free. I am looking forward to a jolly run with the "Hawkhurst" hounds next month. By the way, do you remember little Ensign Tomkins? The noodle proposed to me last Monday, and I boxed his ears! Love, indeed! Why, anybody with an atom of sense knows that is all stuff—a mere evidence of incipient insanity. The way he rolled his eyes was a caution. Drop me a line when you feel like it.

Yours sincerely,

CLARE MONCRIEFF.

Locksley groaned, but quickly added: "She's a brick! Ah! my Lady Clare, love is not nonsense because I am unable to raise a flutter in your breast. You will find it out some day. I shouldn't be surprised to hear that you are finally subjugated by a little meek fellow whose height is less than five feet!"

He laughed merrily, concluding: "I will have a quiet half-hour with Lady Clare, and end the matter once and for all. I know that it will be a great relief to her, as it will be to me."

When Melville came back, he saw that Locksley was smiling serenely. "Well," he said, "has Lady Clare power to drag you to town at once?"

"She does not desire my immediate presence, Melville; but I intend settling her mind at rest, and my father's at the same time. This question of my marriage shall be solved within forty-eight hours."

"My dear fellow," Melville cried, delightedly, "you have taken a load off my mind, by Jove!"

Before Locksley could reply, he was shaking him warmly by the hand; and upon second thought, he decided to say no more to his friend upon the subject at present.

"Now, this Morden inquiry," the viscount proceeded, "I find that the present Lord Morden—"

"Then he lives?" demanded Locksley, sharply.

"He lives; in fact, I met him in France a year since I find that the present Lord Morden made an important marriage in his youth—imprudent in the eyes of his friends. For years he lived under an assumed name, even keeping the secret of his identity from his wife. Finally this led to misunderstandings, and they parted. There is a painful story somewhere which was never cleared up."

"Perhaps you mean a shameful story," interpolated Locksley, excitedly. "No, my dear fellow, no. I am sure there was not, for Lord Morden is a high-minded, honorable man. The relatives on both sides caused the trouble, through some mistaken notion, and unhappy circumstances lent color to suggestions and insinuations that had no real foundations, two people being made thereby uselessly unhappy. That is all that I can tell you, my dear fellow."

"And I am more than satisfied, Melville," said Locksley, gratefully, his eyes shining with some powerful emotion that he carefully shielded from his friend. "Yes, I am more than satisfied, and promise to run down your hobby-horse again."

"I do not see that there is any reason for you to take the information to Captain Deane," observed Melville. "I think that he would prefer to have it carefully written out; at least, I should, under the same circumstances."

"What do you know of the circumstances?"

"Oh, nothing but what you have told me, of course," stammered Melville.

"No, I promised to call at the 'First' to-morrow, and I shall certainly keep the promise. Why, Melville, old man, I would not break it for worlds!"

The viscount regarded him in astonishment, and again that strange, uneasy expression passed over his usually placid countenance, and he thought: "I wish that I could be there, too. I feel that there is mischief in the air!"

The afternoon dragged through its weary length, and after dinner Edmund wrote two or three letters. When the holiday-makers had left the beach, he went for a long stroll under the light of a full moon—he went where he could think of Miss Deane.

"I did not know that it was in my nature to love like this," he thought. "I wonder what Lady Clare will say when I tell her! Oh, how glad I am that I have pleasant news to tell my beautiful Dora!"

A hot thrill shot through his veins as he whispered her name. "Dora! Dora!"

A pretty name, but not half so pretty as the owner. That night his dreams were all of Dora, and he heard in fancy the sweet song that he had been forced to interrupt so rudely. The refrain rang in his ears unpleasantly now, and he awakened with a chill of terror at his heart.

After breakfast, he made a careful toilet, and at eleven o'clock wished Viscount Melville good-by, saying: "I shall not be back until eight or nine o'clock. Don't wait dinner for me."

"By Jove!" thought Melville. "One would think that there was a woman in the case! Had he not given me this positive assurance that he will promptly settle matters with Lady Clare, I would follow him!"

Meanwhile, Locksley went on to Deal by train, and arrived there fully an hour earlier than was needed. From Deal he intended walking to Captain Deane's house, lest a vehicle should attract attention.

Heart Beat by Wireless

HEARD BY DOCTORS MILES AWAY.

The heart beats of three men were sent a mile by telephone to the B.B.G. Studio at Cardiff, recently, and broadcasted from there to doctors, in an experiment to discover whether it might be possible for a doctor to diagnose the illness of a patient by wireless. The experiment was a remarkable success. An appeal was made to doctors in South Wales to the West of England to listen with the object of ascertaining at what distance the heart beats could be detected. One of the men whose heart beats were broadcast was in perfect health, but the other two suffered from heart disease. A special microphone was strapped over the heart of each patient, and each microphone was connected to a twelve-valve amplifier. One of the three doctors present remained in the room to superintend the patients while the other two went into another room in the studio and listened at a loud speaker.

Startling Results. The twelve-valve amplifier was connected with the telephone wire, which carried the sounds to the transmitting station a mile away. From there the beats were transmitted by wireless back to the B.B.G. studio, and were heard by the two doctors.

"The sounds were weak at first," said one of the doctors, "but after increased amplification it became possible for us to tell what was wrong with the hearts by the different beats. The heart beats in the case of the young man upon whom we first experimented were not at all times distinguishable, but with the men suffering from heart disease the results were good."

"We hope, before long, that excellent results of scientific value will be obtained through the medium of wireless telephony. We have been much impressed, and hope to experiment again shortly."

Just Folks. By EDGAR GUEST. THE FAITH OF THE TRAVELLING MAN.

Since I've been a bit of a travelling man My heart goes out to the drummer-clash. For I've learned a lot which I didn't know In my younger days, as I watched them go. When I envy them and their chance to ride Over the country and far and wide; But I've lost the lure of a leather grip. And I live in fear of another trip. And I've shaped my life to a different plan, For I haven't the faith of a travelling man.

I haven't that faith which can keep me strong. When I'm outward bound and the miles are long, I can laugh and jest till the day is through. But I can't keep up on a letter or two, And I long for the sight of a touselled mother writes I haven't had faith for the lonely nights, I frequently doubt what the letters say. And I long to see them to know they're well!

But a travelling man must travel along Whether matters at home are right or wrong. He cannot go to their rooms at night And see for himself that they are all right. He must live by faith at the long day's close! He must think them well, but he never brings the news to his loved ones.

He must cure himself when his thoughts grow black. And that is the sort of high faith I mean. "Don't worry! We're well!" she may write to me, But I've got to be with them where I can see.

Sugar or Molasses. A gallon of Molasses which retails for about 90 cents to one dollar, contains from 6 to 7 pounds of sugar, and at one dollar per gallon, the sugar content costs over 12 cents per pound; therefore molasses as a sweetening agent is more expensive than sugar.

A good quality of soft sugar will be found much better and cheaper than molasses for use in cakes, puddings, sweet bread, etc. Twelve ounces of soft sugar equals one pint of molasses.

It must be borne in mind that all soft sugars are not equally good. One of the best is Lantic Brown Sugar. This excellent sugar is sold in cartons of bulk, at 8 cents per pound, and at this price it equals molasses at about 50 cents per gallon.

If you like coffee try it this way:—Use a tablespoon measure of any high grade coffee to each cup of water, bring to boiling point, then strain. (Use same quantity in your percolator) Your coffee liquor is now ready to use. Now take a half cup of the coffee liquor fill up with hot milk, sweeten with Lantic Brown Sugar and drink a beverage fit for the gods.

Lantic Brown Sugar dissolved in hot water makes a delicious syrup for pan cakes, puddings, etc. It is wholesome and tasty. Children like it on bread. Don't forget, sugar is a real food.

Lantic Brown Sugar is practically good molasses refined and solidified, the water and impurities are removed in refining.—mar19,tu,th who had gathered on the field to watch. The test grew out of a discussion of an article in a newspaper concerning a man who had jumped off the Brooklyn Bridge. The parachute experts contended that a falling person retained his senses, and prevailed on Major William N. Hensley, commandant of the post, to let them prove their contention.

Staff Sergeant Randle L. Bose and Corporal Arthur Bergo went aloft in a Martin bombing plane. When the machine had reached the 3,000-foot level they jumped. Down they plunged with their parachutes closed. The crowd gasped as the men shot through the air. After descending a short distance the aviators twisted, twisted and somersaulted.

The visitors on the field ran toward the spot where they thought the men would fall in a heap. When the pair reached the 2,000-foot level they pulled the rip cords of the parachutes, which opened, and they sailed to the field like birds.

Before the crowd could question them about the sensations of the 1,000-foot dive, Bose and Bergo went up in the bombing plane again to repeat the test. This time Bose pulled the rip cord at 800 feet and Bergo dropped only 400 feet, inadvertently opening his parachute. After they had reached the field both said that at no time had they lost control of themselves. They said that they breathed easily, but experienced a thrill when their flights were suddenly checked by the opening parachutes.

Major Hensley said that the test showed that a person in normal physical condition, jumping from the Woolworth building tower, would retain his senses until he reached the pavement.
