rations time did Stephen walk to re, never heeding her but absorbed ely in his own reflections—so long Milley, who was now rested and shed, began to contemplate taking sparture, and finishing the journey near the loved mistress she had so far to join, and the happiness micipated from the meeting made imple heart thrill with joy. Poor, lul, devoted Milley, what a disap-ment was she doomed to experience and taken her long journey in vain least so far as her own hopes were smed. It was indeed destined to important results, but only to the th of the man before her, who by coming and by a strange and wonder-cident, had reached through her hacious revelations to a momentous server, and one which affected him to you by a shorter way than the high road. Come.

So saying he closed the gate, and turned off short along the road, making a motion to Milley to follow him.
At the distance of half a mile they came to a little gate, which gave access to a wood with a footpath winding through it. This was the beginning of the Ardgowan property, and the path so made afforded a much nearer route to the mansion than by the high road.
This was the path which Stephen meant to take, and, as the gate hitherto had only been fastened by a latch, he put out his hand and tried to raise it. He did raise it but the gate refused to yield to this pressure, and, on looking to discover the reason, he found that a lock was now placed upon it. The sight of this—the work of Natham Garret—produced a gust of rage in his boson, and with a fierce oath he flung himself furiously against the barrier, and forced it open with a reash, thus effecting an entrance, though in so violent a way that Milley was frightened to follow him within.

"Yes, massa, dat just her."

"And your mistress—was she tall and dark, too?"

"Missus beautiful," answered Milley, with rapture; "blue eyes, long, long bright hair, much smile, sweet voice."

"Ah, that will do; the revelation is complete. I might have guessed." he mutered, "that George Morrar would never have married such a woman."

Nothing more was said during the rest of the way, and when they came in sight of the house they kept within the shelter of the trees, as if Stephen did not wish them to be seen.

And such, indeed, was his wish, for his object was to take Garret and his componion by surprise—to confront them with Milley without a moment's preparation.

Resching the lawn in this manner, they they passed within, without meeting even a sorvant.

Here they stood to listen, and in the silence voices reached them from a room to the right—the very room in which Stephen and Malcolm had been introduced by Garret to the fictitious Mrs. Morrar. As Stephen remembered this seene, a grim smile came upon his face, and, drawing Milley close to his side, he threw open the door with a quick effort, and strode forward, leading Milley by the hand.

Mr. Henry Maudsley says: "The full and healthy development of all the lower natural forces are indispensably pre-requisite to the existence of a sound and vigerous mind." Just so. Humanity requires the full equivalent of vital force in order for the free and potent manifestations of the mind. When we consider that Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites supplies the deficiency to unhealthy blood, restores the nervous elements, and produces healthy action to the various organs and forces of the body necessary to sound mind, we wonder at the imbeedity everywhere apparent.—As a deficiency of healthy blood, or a direct loss of this fuid, are causes of the senses, and also of the nervous system generally, we can safely calculate on the disappearance of such unpleasant and dangerous disturbances as the condition of the blood improves.
