Sara was silent. It was in her nature be true; and, as she believed, it was in er nature to be able to suffer.

"There were times when I felt tempted wish I had stayed at home and battled ith it, resumed Captain Davens!, after a subse. "But in that case the scandal would ave gone forth to the world. As it was, no ving being knew of it, save you and my ther."

"To Mr. A'fred King. Don't you see the receipts?"

"I'd walk ten miles before breakfast any morning to see that fellow hanged. It's what he'll come to."

"He told me that he and you had once been friends," she said, in a half whipper.

"And so we were. I believed in the clow; I had no suspicion that he was a sillain, and I let him draw me into things rom which I could not extricate myself. I was a fool and I had to pay for it."

In Sara's inmost heart there arose unbidden a rebellious thought; that others had had to pay for it; not Captain Davenal.

"Did it affect my father's health, this business?" he inquired, in a low tone.
"I fear It did," she replied, feeling that she could not avoid the confession. "I am sure it affected him mentally. There was a great change in him from that night."

Captain Davenal folded the papers slowly and pushed them into his waistoost pocket a his usual eareless manner. "What a fool was!" he muttered; "and what a rogue was the other!"
