COMPOUNDING A MISDEMEANOUR— COMPROMISING JUSTICE.

A singular attempt to compromise justice was last week met by Mr. Baron Bramwell in the manner it deserved. It will be within the recollection of our readers that Edward Hammond pleaded guilty† to an indictment preferred against him at the November sittings of the Central Criminal Court for unlawfully imprisoning and assaulting his wife, at his residence at Peckham, and that on the 11th instant, when he came up for judgment, the counsel for the prosecution stated that the prisoner had, since the trial, executed a deed of separation from his wife, and also a settlement upon her, to the entire satisfaction of her legal advisers and herself, and that, in consequence of this arrangement, they did not desire to press for punishment. It appeared that the settlement was of one-half of the wife's property, the husband having none of his own. The prisoner's counsel then coolly submitted to the Court that the matter being settled and arranged, and as the prosecutrix did not press for punishment, the Court should discharge the defendant upon his own recognizances to come up for judgment when called upon, or that the case should again stand over until next session, in order that the defendant might file affidavits to deny certain statements, alleged to be falsehoods, contained in the depositions in the case. The learned judge declined to adopt any such suggestions, and required to know if the defendant was in attendance, and ordered him to surrender. The defendant, who had been standing behind his counsel, seemed much surprised at the order, but, of course, had no option but to submit, and was immediately placed in the dock.

His Lordship then addressed him as follows:—"You have pleaded guilty to an indictment charging you with an offence of very great
