Tamales.

GREEN corn is on the market and green living again. Society has been fooling with green corn and declares that it must now be eaten with silver corn stabs for hands, or that the grains must be cut with a dangerous-looking little rake called a "slitter" before our old friend King Corn may enter the dining-room. But whether it is eaten with silver jewelry, on or off the cob, or with those God-given implements used before forks were invented, we love it and are glad to welcome it back.

It is said that several years ago a great corn festival was held in Paris, France. Corn growers and corn product manufacturers sent their goods and grains, and A. No. 1 chefs over to show the Parisian what to do with corn, and how to eat it.

The display was most lavish; no expense was spared, but it was a failure. It seems that only Americans have the innate courage to eat corn on the cob, or the true appreciation of good eating that values corn dishes.

Corn is our best friend and the housewife's salvation, for when the whole family is tired of everything in the eating category, she can fall back on corn and have it in a different style every day for a year.

Then when the corn is eaten the husks are useful. They can be used to make braided mats for the porch and to stuff pillows with for special occasions. What occasions? Those occasions when company comes that threatens to stay too long. A pillow stuffed with corn husks is guaranteed to move the most invariable caller that ever called when placed at said caller's back.

The best use, however, for corn husks is to hold tamales. If you have ever been in one of those Louisiana towns where the colored boys come thru the streets calling "Hot tamales," in their soft southern drawl, you will join with me in being glad green corn is here so we can get some husks and have some tamales.

This is the way the creole cooks make them:

Bail a tender young chicken and the same weight of lean veal together until the meat falls from the bones. Chop this until very fine. Mince a clove of garlic and to it add a crumpled bay leaf, a sprig of parsley minced, a sprig of fresh thyme, one cup crushed cracker crumbs, a dash of cayenne and a bit of chili pepper. Mash enough boiled Irish potato to fill a measuring cup. Put all these things in a deep porcelain pan, and add a spoonful of onion salt if you like the flavor (many persons think they do not like tamales when it is the quantity of onion and garlic they object to).

Moisten with a little of the chicken and veal broth. Cook, stirring constantly, about five minutes, when the mixture should be smooth and very thick. Taste and if not very sharp add more cayenne pepper.

Have a kettle of fresh water boiling on the range. Remove the mixture from the fire and place about two tablespoonsful of it in a nice, clean, large, green corn husk. Wrap this in another husk and tie securely with twine. Slip off the rough ends of the husks with scissors and drop the wrapped tamales into the boiling water.

Let them boil four minutes, then lift out and drain and send to the table before the meal begins. They are famous appetizers.

The tamales may be made and tied in the husks a day or two before they are boiled, if they are kept in a refrigerator. I think this improves their flavor and it is the creole cook's way.

CANDYTUFF

Iberis Semivirens, the evergreen candytuff, and Iberis Umbellata, the purple candytuff, are two really old-fashioned flowers, for it is recorded in botanical magazines that the seeds of these varieties were first introduced into England about the year 1587.

In that year a gardener, one Gerard, received from the island of Crete the seeds of the "candytuff" which he planted at once in his own garden, producing the first year flat heads of purple, white, blue, pinkish-white, and a deep cream. From the name "Candy" or "Candy" which was the ancient name of the island of Crete, the flowers received their name, "candytuff."

So that the little flower is quite 300 years old, with us, at any rate.

The common white, or evergreen variety, is, without exception, one of the best bordering plants that can be found, ranking closely with sweet alyssum, myosotis, and pilox subulata. Where durability, cheapness, and ease in keeping within bounds are points to be considered, this little plant fills every requirement mentioned. Blooming, as it does, almost from the first few days, it so provides an abundance of flowers when flowers are at a premium. Like the myosotis, the long, straggling seed stalks may be sheared off close to the ground, and in a very short time the new shoots will make the compact evergreen border, scattered here and there with an occasional bloom.

You will remember, in describing the myosotis, some weeks ago, we discovered that, after shearing, bloom will appear a second time, almost as profuse as the first crop. This is not quite the case with the candytuff; all its secondary efforts being expended in the formation of a close, miniature hedge.

One good point about such a border is the fact that it will last for years, each year helping to thicken and harden the year before, up to about the sixth year, after which it will commence to deteriorate.

For the rocky, it is unequalled as a ground cover, spreading with great rapidity, clinging to the rough surfaces of the rocks, finding its way and rooting itself in small crannies and crevices between the stones.

The common annual candytuff, with colored flowers, is the purple variety; but, while the name would imply that one color alone is to be looked for, yet what really does occur is a truly wonderful array of nearly every tint except deep yellow.

The base color is purple. But this purple comes out in so many tints and shades that we practically have everything, from deepest maroon, ranging thru magentas, pinks, blues, flesh tints, all of the most delicate variations, until the eye cannot but be satisfied, as well as delighted, with the feast of colors.

A delightful combination edging is formed by planting alternate clumps of Phlox subulata, common white candytuff, and myosotis, which will promise you an edging of infinite variety in color, form, and perfume.

WHERE TO FISH.

The Canadian Northern has just published a splendid little brochure of 48 pages full of information on the best fishing spots in Ontario and Quebec. The booklet is most instructive; it contains a categorical list of all the points with original and reliable information on the fishing and where fishermen can get accommodation. It includes the fishing regulations of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and some fine illustrations including types of the principal fish. This publication can be obtained at any of the Canadian Northern ticket offices, or write R. L. Fairbairn, General Passenger Agent, Toronto, Ont.

IS SINGING THE CITY FOR FALSE ARREST

Jury Returns Sealed Verdict in T. E. L. Lineman's Action.

The fight between the city and the Toronto Power Co., over the erection of poles at Davenport road and Bathurst street last October, when a number of linemen were placed under arrest, came up in the jury civil assize court yesterday, when Wm. Waters, one of the linemen, brought action against the city for $500 damages for false arrest. The jury returned a sealed verdict which will be opened when the court resumes this morning.

If waters is successful in his action, suit will also be brought against the city for a similar amount by J. A. Chambers, A. Copeland, Wm. Heston, Robt. Robertson, A. Hayes and Donald Miller, other linemen who were arrested with Waters.

OLD BERLIN RESIDENT'S DEATH.

BERLIN, Ont., May 29.—(Special).—Albert Hall, aged 44, a grocer of this city, and a life long resident and a trustee of St. Peter's Lutheran Church, passed away suddenly here tonight after a week's illness of pneumonia.

CHILD FELL INTO LYE.

(KINGSTON, May 29.—(Special).—Johnny Bradford, aged two, son of John Bradford, Yarker, fell into a dish of lye and was badly burned. Some of it went into his eyes, but the sight will be saved.

SCHOOL PRINCIPAL CENSURED

Brantford, May 29.—(Special).—Principal D. C. White received a severe lecture here today from Magistrate Livingston, when he was charged with assaulting a boy pupil at King Edward School. The principal, who had been advised by the parents not to hit the boy, stated he took no advice from any one in that regard when pupils were unruly. The magistrate read school regulations to him and advised the principal not to repeat the offence. The boy was black and blue from the corporal punishment.
