

Spanish gold repose in the dark throats of two land-crab burrows.

On the eastern slope, beneath the floor of the plantation-house which Colonel Mansard had built, and twelve inches below the surface of the cool earth, lies Tomas Silva's treasure, unsuspected and forgotten, where Captain Flint put it and where the good Tomas left it. No living person knows or cares anything about it.

THE END