

here received a temporary scare shortly after 10 o'clock tonight when the stern suddenly started to settle. Quick action on the part of an army balloon officer, who ordered a man to climb into the car and allow several tons of water ballast at the stern to escape, prevented any damage being done to the craft. With the release of the water the stern rose into the air and soon assumed a correct posture. A gradual settling of the craft is expected until about 2.30 o'clock tomorrow morning when the hydrogen in the bag reaches its highest point of contraction, but precautions have been taken to prevent a sudden dropping of the ship and possible damage to its structure.

THE DAY AT OTTAWA

By TOM KING

Ottawa, July 7.—Prorogation has often been likened to school commencement, but it also resembles a general jail delivery. The members released from further attendance rush to the streets with such evident joy and relief that you take it for granted that they will never return to Ottawa. But they will, and when they get back for another session they will mark time in the usual way for months, and then in the closing hours vote supply at the rate of a million dollars a minute. The closing ceremonies today were simple to the point of meagreness. There was none of the pomp and display that characterized prorogation before the war. The handful of members who remained to the last heard a speech from the throne optimistic over the way in which Canada had weathered the war, and was providing for the men returning from overseas. Sir Thomas White himself must have written it.

In the house this morning, several announcements were made by the prime minister. The bills providing for the continuance of "bone dry" prohibition for twelve months after the proclamation of peace, and the establishment of divorce courts and for the establishment of a permanent purchasing commissioner for all the departments of the government, were formally abandoned. Then Sir Robert spoke of the league of nations, the clauses in the peace treaty respecting labor and the successful fight he had put up for the representation of Canada in the league. Next he explained his connection with the Manitoba Cold Storage Company, which had been taken to a period long prior to his accession to power. Finally he moved in an appropriate speech, a resolution of commendation and gratitude for the valor and patriotism of the brave men who so gallantly represented Canada in the great war. The house had cleared its order

GEN. SMART REPLIES TO "INSINUATIONS"

Smart said that the medical administration had contrary to regulations taken it upon itself to use the intelligence branch of the service in getting confidential reports on medical officers, spying on them, and in cases where he had put a sergeant of the intelligence branch under arrest, and would have put his officer under arrest if he had not suddenly left the camp.

"Sir Thomas White was good enough to get a compliment from Sir Andrew McPhail, saying that he had been extremely painful to him on returning after four years' service to read such speeches as that which I had made. I do not know that Sir Andrew McPhail is competent to meet the charges. I do not talk of him in his medical capacity, but I consider it to be better administered than Sir Andrew McPhail, and I do not credit him as being competent to pass judgment. I had a much longer experience as administrator than he. Sir Thomas White was most unfortunate in his choice of an authority.

He agreed with Sir Andrew that the V.A.D. places were better than nothing, but why put patients there when there were Canadian hospitals half vacant.

Sort of Press Agent.
"I do not accept him as an authority on the organization of the Canadian army medical corps. I do not know exactly what his duties were overseas. He seemed to be a sort of advance press agent for General Foster. I do not know that Sir Andrew McPhail was that he was detailed by Foster to defend one of those officers who had come up for enquiry and allowed to go to the front. He was not an authority on military law, but I do not accept him as an authority on hospital administration.

General Smart specified cases to this effect and according to him, cases where wounded men had been sent all around without proper care when there was plenty of room in properly equipped Canadian hospitals. Sir Andrew had protested against getting men when it was too late, and had been snubbed by his pains.

"They were sent there to foster what Sir George Perley called the 'imperial spirit,' as if those poor fellows who had been stricken on the field had not done enough to foster the imperial spirit." (Applauds.)

Gen. Smart referred to the order to the effect that fit men were to be culled out of the camps for treatment in the hospital which he enforced in Shorncliffe, and Col. Chisholm, Gen. Foster's assistant, had then said he had impaired the efficiency of the hospital. Gen. Smart had received an apology from Gen. Foster, after much wailing and hesitation and quibbling. He quoted from a book recently published by Col. Bruce, in which much reference is made to Prussianism in the medical service administration, and in this connection Gen. Smart referred to the treatment accorded to Col. Wilson, who had been sent to a forward corps in France and read the correspondence in connection thereto, and also said that Gen. Foster, apropos of Col. Wilson, had made this remark: "Well, I am glad he is taking his medicine."

That had been a bad case of persecution because Wilson had wanted to work for his country. Foster had been out to "get him," and that was the kind of a man Sir Thomas White was defending.

Lack of Harmony.
Reiteration of his charges that there had been lack of harmony between the Canadian army authorities in Canada, Great Britain and England and France, each being a water-tight compartment, was given by Gen. Smart. Sir Hughes had said also that there was no harmony between Canada and England and Sir Sam should know, and he only hoped he would tell all the world. At the same time, he said that General McEwburn meant to call for a showdown when he was in England and be minister of England as well as in Canada. There was another

The public school required $13,000, and the high school $10,000, both amounts were approved. This year's school grant is considerably higher than any previous year, and the increase is largely due to the higher amount of the public school grant which the public school grant approximately $800, but it was stated that the unusual mistake had been made in the estimate for that time.
