Cars, and their suspicions were confirmed.

The Asquithians took up their position on the platform to wait until Mr. Asquith came in, and the moment he got out of the train a bodyguard was formed around him. His friends got him into one of the two cars that were waiting for them, and in one of these he was driven to King's College.

The foiled kidnappers made a second blunder at this period. Instead of following the car in which Mr. Asquith rode away, they chased a second car which contained other officials of the University Liberal Club.

The Haunted Market

A Canadian doctor in New York hearing by letter that there were rumors of a ghost haunting the country market in St. John, fell into poetry and sent the following verses, each one of the three appropriately illustrated on the margin with a free hand drawing, the first of a cow, the second of a sheep and the third of a pig. Here are the verses:

ONE.

Oh! I am the ghost of the cow that was,

was,
The Bossy that used to be;
And I come to the market every night,
About half-past two or three.
I'm looking for that Butcher-man,
Who turned me into Stew
And Steak and Chops, and used me up
From the tip of my tail to my "Moo."

TWO.

And I am the ghost of the ba-ba sheep
That Mary used to know;
I'm on the look-out for the Butcher-

man
Who started my tale of woe.
You can hear me around here every night
But I'm only a ghost, you see,
So the noise that I make is mostly fake,
Though I bleat in highest "C."

THREE.

Well, I make a poor third to the noise you've heard,
But I'm quietly on the hunt
For the Butcher-man who put into a

Every bit of me but by GRUNT.

He used his art to cut into my heart
With a knife of the sharpest steel,
And he utilized me to the Nth. degree,
But he couldn't can up my SQUEAL. CHORUS.
So WE are the three that used to be;
And we prowl here every night.
When we meet that greasy Butcher

man
We'll make him die of fright.
