

lege, the learned writer correctly affirms that "it is difficult to vindicate on principle the duplicate system of local High Schools combined with a great central college for the same class of pupils. The College is, in fact," he adds, "a survival from the educational era before High Schools," and, reading between the lines, there is little difficulty in concluding that the writer's opinion is that the institution should be abolished. This inference is strengthened by the remark, with which the writer concludes, that the endowment, should it be placed at the Government's disposal, would be wisely expended in forming a College for Women, "where Art of every kind and grade, music, and everything else specially pertaining to female culture might be taught." — Canada Educational Monthly.
