Engineer's Terrible Ordeal.

Engineer H. A. Lipscomb of the passenger train was caught beneath his engine, and it was found impossible to remove the broken iron from his body on account of the way in which one of his legs was entangled. Escaping steam across his face made it impossible to administer anaesthetics, and as a result physicians amputated the leg as he lay there conscious.

Despite the scalding steam and the pain of the operation he bore it bravely.

The wreck was due, it is said, to the failure of an operator to throw a switch. The westbound freight had received orders to meet the passenger at the western limits of the Bellaire yard, and was moving slowly along the siding. At the point where the wreck occurred, there is a very sharp curve, which prevents the engineers of eastbound trains from seeing more than a few feet ahead. The passenger train swung around the curve very rapidly, being three hours late, and should have gone on in safety on the main line. The switch to the siding, however, had not been turned, and the train shot onto the siding and into the freight. There was scarcely time to apply the brakes and no time for the engine men to jump.
