the theatres are extremely low, and the Japanese spend all of their leisure time looking at pictures.

"Many odd customs prevail. Incidental to the showing of a picture in a Japanese theatre, a lecturer appears at the side of the screen and deplets the emotions of the actors. He weeps audibly with the heroine and roars with laughter at the antics of the comedian. It is hard work, and these interpreters work in relays, adithough they seldom retire until they fall from exhaustion.

"The Chinese depend almost exclusively on America and Japan for their films, and have no native companies. The Chinese theatres are divided into two parts, the men sitting in the orchestra and the women in the gallery. Scenes that are laughable to an American are enacted in these Oriental movie houses. As the visitor deposits his ticket of admission in the box at the door, he is handed a hot towel. As he walks to his seat, he wipes his hands and face to remove the grime and moisture to make himself as comfortable as possible for the pleasure that is to follow. But the theatre owner insists on getting his towels back and the Chinnoisture to make himself as comfort-tible as possible for the pleasure that is to follow. But the theatre owner insists to follow. But the theatre owner insists to follow. But the theatre owner insists as ladies and gentlemen, after they are seated, throw them across the house to seated, throw them across the house to ushers who are stationed at various points. Sometimes, when business is good the house is filled with flying towels, sometimes to the detriment of the screening of the picture.

"Each person of the audience is also supplied with a cup of tea, which he sips with a gusto that frequently, when a thousand persons are in the theatre, resembles the escaping of steam from a damaged boiler. Despite these minor interruptions, the Chinese enjoy the silent drama to the fullest extent and are not critical if the film is seven or eight years old and sometimes so badly scratched and damaged that it is little short of impossible to distinguish exactly from the movements of the figures and the numerous defects of the film."
