gnantly. 'Never mind, dear, let's not think any ore about it,' replied Eleanor, feigning a olness and indifference she did not feel. Carte blanche was given her, no expense s to be spared, and for days Eleanor th her assistants were busy preparing for Leigh dinner.

The eventful day came, and Eleanor went with her work mechanically. In the rlor was Bessie Carr, the petted and heaed guest, the silvery laugh rang out mer-y. Eleanor shivered when she thought her own position, a common servant, hen only a short time since Charlie Leigh d almost made her believe (not by words) at the Leigh home was not complete with-t her. How seen he had forgotten her, d for Bessie Carr.

nd for Bessie Carr. Bravely she performed her task, listened to Mrs. Leigh's praises of her skill and thanks for the 'great favor,' received the money due her, and went home. Bessie's aughter and the tinkling of the piano, all was painful to her and she was glad to leave t behind her. 'Hers it is, my wages,' said Bleanor as she tossed the crisp bills into Nettie's lap, a curious burning sensation in her eyelida,
