While Jackson was in the sitting room Captain McCullough asked him: "Jackson, why did you kill Mary Jane Sullivan?" "Captain," he replied, "I didn't mean to kill her. I just hit her one skite on the head with a stick, and she fell down stairs. Then I ran and picked her up, and carried her up stairs, and put her in bed. I saw that she was very weak, and could not speak. Her head was cut and bleeding. I got some water in a basin and washed her face and head, but it didn't do her any good. Then I thought that she was either dead or going to die, and I got frightened. I then started to go to Sarvent's dance house at 49 Sullivan street. On my way there I met a big mulatto man with whom I was acquainted. I told him about what I had done, and he said to me, "Jesus, Jim, you had better cut your throat. for they FOUR TRIPS A WEEK. This is called "The Iconoclast of Sensibility," and narrates how Mr. Willoughby Aspen "bonnetted" the rascal who had painted quack names on a magnificent rock, with his own paint-pot. In contrast there is a wintry feeling about Rev. Charles T. Brooks's poem, "A Winter Sunrise on the Hudson." Two other papers in this number will attract attention,—Rev. E. E. Hale's article on "A Good Appetite," and a straightforward and simply-told narrative of occurrences in McClellan's first campaign in West Virginia, in 1861, by an engineer officer who took an important part in it. Besides Mr. Brooks's poem, there is a short one called "Misunderstood," by Norah Perry. Of the editorials, one is on the proposed new "unobjectionable orthodes" exercises to be stated in New York.
