FEEDING HAY CONTAINING WATER HEMLOCK

In reply to questions regarding the danger of feeding hay containing water hemlock, that is the dry stalks of this weed, we quote part of a letter received from P. R. Talbot, provincial veterinarian for Alberta, as follows:

"I may say that we receive a great many letters inquiring as to the dangers of feeding hay containing these plants, and after many investigations we find that the dry stalk when put up with hay has not produced many bad results. Occasionally in the winter, however, we have found animals have died with symptoms of water hemlock poisoning and on investigation it has been found that the hay contained not only the plant but the root as well.

We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that these roots have been pulled up with some mower guards, and though apparently dried up they still contain some of the poisonous principle and when eaten by cattle produce poisonous effects. We therefore recommend that the farmer should pick out the roots before feeding this hay, but think that the stalks, provided of course they are not too numerous, may be fed with safety."
