SEVENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF ACADIA UNIVERSIT

At great length and with fine enthusiasm, President Wood recalled the beauties of the ages, the wealth that lies all about us in the books of these good and dear man of letters who have in their writings become immortal. He then spoke of the value of edication of intellectual co aradeships. He deplored the fact that specialization as a phase of the present age was destroying our wider intellectuality. No longer does man belong to the board university of al men, but shutting himself in his own alleys works out alone his own small or great problem. Solitude becomes his congenial atmosphere. Specialization is very well, if it is laid upon a foundation of broad general culture. Let the universities specialize if they must, but let the college stand eral training which enriches and en- Acadia Seminary. bes life and makes intellectual and spiritual comradeships out of all sorts sident. Mrs. Grant presided. fresh for this great, clear service, sponded to by twenty-six members. Standing here in the presence of this noble company of earnest and Christian men and women, and in the presence of that larger but invisible company who have here wrought at their life tasks and have now finished their course, standing here within this stately home of academic and Christian culture, may I not fitly use the the cause of Dartmouth College: "Sirs, it is a small college, but there are those who love it.

This college business in which they were all so deeply interested had grown to be one of the greatest industries on the American continent. And there never had been a time when a greater degree interest was taken in the work of the college, whether they were tax-supported institutions, or denomi- of the Women's Missionary Society of rational foundations, or supported by the Methodist Church of Canada openprivate endowments. A comparison of the small college with those of larger scope would seem to show that both had there own peculiar characteristics and advantages. In favor of the small college was the fact that it was so well together: the intimate companionship of students with each other lessened the danger arising from cliques, and produced in most cases a genuine esprit de corps. And in the small college the professor-in addition being, as he usually was, a good teacher-had great opportunities of exercising a direct personal influence on his students. And there was not so much danger in the small colleges of sacrificing what are known as the "humanities" to the need of technical instruction. Classics, mathematics, his-definition of the general purpose of collese education Dr. Peterson said that he agreed that the university must be for specialists. The university alone can adequately cover the higher parts of technical instruction, safeguarding the "disinterestedness" of science and keeping in due subordination to the pure search for truth the material advantage and "bread earning" potencies that may be involved in any particular branch of study. It is in the university that we can best combat the somewhat crudely expressed wishes of a parent who says: "My boy wants to be a chemist or an engineer; put him through a practical course in the shortest possible time." A year or two's delay, if he can afford to wait, will make all the better man of him. Not that we do not believe in specialization, but we also believe that the student makes a mistake when in his haste to advance himself in some special field he turns his back on the advantages of a broad general education. Let him have an opportunity of developing an organist; Miss Evelyn Huey and Miss Allen on behalf of the defendant apinterest in other subjects outside his own particular sphere; so shall we secure that he shall rise superior to the knacks of a trade and that those who may become the future leaders of great industrial undertakings shall have a mastery of principles as well as the faculty of well-balanced judgment and careful discrimination which—as distinct from the mere acquisitnon of information-is the mark of a sound and comprehensive education.
