Miss Maie Warner Howell, who died at 8.30 o'clock yesterday morning at her mother's home in Newark had nearly completed her 22d year. To-day is the anniversary of her birth. Her father, T. P. Howell, now dead, was a pioneer in the manufacture of patent leather in this country. She was a robust young woman, with jet black hair, rosy cheeks and large brown eyes. Although below the average height she was regarded as one of the most beautiful women in Newark and was welcomed at every entertainment in Newark's most exclusive social circles. She was a popular member of a set that held three cotilions during the winter at a private hall in the large building at 721 Broad-spreet. At the last cotilion on Feb. 21, while the was dancing with Mr. Bryden Lamb, she-tripped, or slipped, and fell heavily upon the polished floor, pulling Mr. Lamb down across her back. She did not complan of any injury at the time, and she continued to dance throughout the evening. Mr. Lamb is regard-ed as one of the best dancers in Newark, while Miss Howell seidom danced, and she could not be considered expert. Bhe fait no ill effects of her fall until Tues-day, March 1, when she complained of feeling ill, and refused to leave her bed in the morn-ing. On the following Sunday she was sto lusive social circle le's ill, and refused to leave her bed in the morn-ing. On the following Sunday she was at-tacked with paralysa, which fettered all har limbs, but left her mind perfectly clear. After that she continued entirely helpless, growing gradually worse all the time, but occasionally reviving slightly and giving her relatives ea-couragement to believe that she might re-cover. On Sunday last the symptoms changed for the worse, and she became uncoasciona. On Monday it was evident that the end was drawing near, and often her lethargy was mistaken for death. Yesterday morning the was just alive, and between 8 and 9 o'clock she passed away without a tremor or sign to m.ark the division between life and death.

The prices are moderate and as far as pos-sible uniform, the sandwiches being invariably 4 cents, whether they be of game, chicken, to beef or cheese. Above these sideboards are tranged all kinds of drinks in bottles or de-canters—clarets, sherries, ports, brawdies and whiskies. These have their price marked. You can have a dinner sherry at 8 cents a glass, or Amontillado at 16 cents. Then there is an enormous barrel of Base's beer on tap and another of Allsopp. To any of these you help yourself. The beer is 4 cents a glass. When you have lunched you proceed to the counter, and a regular frequenter of the place simply states the amount he hasto pay and no question is asked. A stranger tells what he has had and he is informed what the cost is. The point to note is that implicit confidence is placed in every one, and dhe gratifying fact comes out that this trust is almost never abused. Should Ireland Fight?

From the New York Journal. Mr. Labouchere, the editor, of the London newspaper Truth, argues that the Irish peo-ple ought to resist English oppression and at newspaper from, argues that the frish peo-ple oughts to re-ist English oppression and at once rise is revolt if the Coercion Bill passes. It has taken this brilliant Loudoner a lifetime to reach this point, though every Irishman, and every American who sympathizes with oppressed peoples, reached it long since. Nobody on this side of the sea has any doubt of the moral right of resistance. But resistance is a question of expediency, and is always to be bidged as to whether more can be grained in that way than in an-other way. At this noment for Ireland to revolt would be to play into the hands of the Tory party. Salisbury could afford to dance a jug if the Irish should do any act that would justify military occupation of any consider-able part of the country. Ireland is, by peace and effective agitation, making great progress toward a solid and effective determination of her rights in the United Kingdom. She can fight any time. By fighting now she would spoil the best chance she has had for a centry.

Waiting for Their Son's Return.

The old man had lately taken to sleeping down stars in the front room, "So I kin hear the boy fore he gits to the door, an' open it fur him," he said. Frequently during the night, which is so long to old neople, the poor father would go to the door and hok out, and if the noise of opening and shutting happened to awaken his wife, she would call down to him in her shrill little voice, "Is that you, Sam?" To which the invariable reply vas, "Yee, Sally; I was jes a lo kin' ef I could see any-thing o the boy; but there sin't nuthin'."

One of the forwards in hunching as to be ablowed to how any series of the classifier of the how the series and of the how the series and of the how the series and the series of the classifier makes less for the eye and less for the ear, and more for the reason and the emotions, though it it has therefore slender advantages, it has this: that it does not take men because they are weak and crutch them up upon its worship, and then just leave them as weak after forty years as they were when it found them. A part of its very idea is so to meet the weakness of men as that they shall grow stronger; to preach the truth and then wait till they are able to seize that truth and live by it. It works slowly, but I tell you that when it has finished its work it makes men in the community; and I speak both of the Congregationalists that are called Baptists and those that are called Congregationalists; they are one and the same and ought to be hand in hand with each other, in perfect sympathy.

It really seems as if every poor unfortunate who finds himself stranded in a great city considers its mayor bound to come to his relief. A dashing little woman sent her card in to Mr. Hewitt the other day. He received her. She entered, pretty, sad, tearful. "O, sir," she said, "I'm so unhappy! I'm
