the Country,

don't see much of them, but any one who takes a trip into the country and keeps his eve open as he goes from wood to field, and eye open as he goes from wood to field, and dates:

don't see much of them, but any one who takes a trip into the country and keeps his eye open as he goes from wood to field, and from hill to dale, will get a glimpse of the high jinks that are in progress. The iey hand of winter has let go its grasp on the land, and everywhere is seen and felt the high jinks that are in progress. The shows and ice which were scattered so generously during the winter months have long since been melted, but the water has not yet all reached the great lakes, or even the rivers. No: in many a cedar and tamarac swamp, and in many a low-lying piece of brush, it is stored up as in a sponge, whence it is now exuding and will continue to exude for a long time yet, to the benefit of the farmers and the joy of all those mill-owners—and there are many such-who depend upon a "full dam" for the power to drive their machinery. This is one of the ends which the partial preservation of our forests serves, Drain all the swamps, and cut down all the trees, and the banks of the rivers will not be able to hold the angry foods which will rush down between them in the spring-time after a winter such as the which has just passed.

The forces of nature have awakened from their long sleep. The sap is bounding upwards through the trees, thrilling their whole being with. Iffe, and causing the little buds and leaflets to push themselves open for very gladness. The operation, however, is not a fast one. Even yet, the maples, the elms, the beeches and the there members of the forest aristorreay are but struggling to regain the verdure which in an hour of decay, six or seven months ago, turned crimson and yellow and left them. Another shower or two of gently-falling rain, and a few more warm un'igorating days, will clothe them to their innermost twigs with green. The beech eligibays a peculiarity worth noticing the properties of swamp-willow, whose plentifiel crop of bushy, woolly cathers, the properties of swamp-willow, whose plentifiel crop of bushy, woolly cathers, the properties of swamp-willow, whose ple height, a species of swamp-willow, whose plentiful crop of bushy, woolly catkins puts the uncovered branches of its taller brethren quite to shame. In deep contrast to all the other trees are the pines and balsams and others of that tribe, whose closey green pages attreet the eye amid a sams and others of that tribe, whose glossy-green coats attract the eye amid a wilderness of grays and browns. The forest floor, where dry, is sprinkled thickly with humble vegetation, eager for its full growth. April-jennies and May-flowers, and many other like companions of the spring, too lowly almost to have a name of their own, nod and blossom side by side with rank weeds which now in their infancy will shortly be the despair of the fancy, will shortly be the despair of the thrifty farmer's wife, when she comes to make her butter for the market, and finds that her cows have been partaking largely of these bovine dainties. In the fields the rush of vegetation is tremendous, and you can almost see the fall wheat growing before your eyes. It is a ticklish time just now for this crop. The weather so far has been favorable, but the farmer will breathe more easily a month or three been no heavy frosts at night followed by hot sunshine during the day, the one to heave up and lay bare the roots of the tender plant, and the other to scorch and shrivel them to death. A farmer going to the village blacksmith shop the other morning passed by his field of fall wheat, which was doing nicely. By the time of his return in the evening, the blades, each and every one of them had grown an inch taller. Seeding is being rapidly pushed, and a large part of the oats, peas, spring wheat and other grains are in the ground. The same farmer had a field sown with spring wheat. On Saturday evening it had not appeared above the surface. There was rain that night, on Sunday it was warm, and on leaves, and the yellow daffodils and blue, white and pink hyacinths have as yet few competitors in bloom. The orchard trees are preparing to array themselves in the bridal blossom which they will don in a few days, much of which, like many other hopes and dreams of youth, will shortly be nipped by hard, unkindly frosts.

In a word, the pulses of the earth are beating high, and the tide of, life is running with a fuller current now than it will in placid summer, decaying autumn, or in placid summer, decaying autumn, or stagnant winter. Every day, every hour, counts; and by the time our only trees, the horse-clestruts, have opened their foliage to the city air, the woods and tields will be a mass of luxuriant, living

The "Safety" Hollow-Faced Oar. EDITOR WORLD: Sir-In your admira ble notice of the late James Warin, you have, inadvertently perhaps, made a slight mistake. The late Mr. Warin, who may almost be said to have died in harness was a diligent and studious craftsman and inventor till the close of the year 1883. And his last contribution to the art of rowing, the "Safety" hollow-faced oar, for which you have claimed no more than is its due, was patented in November, 1883, not in 1882 as stated. L. But the grass and clover are growing, and growing fast. The first green of the spring, as of the first grass, or wheat, is a brighter, fresher green than any which will be found later on in the year. It has a vividness, a glow, almost a sparkle, which will be looked for in vain six months hence.
