THE SLEEPING LADY.

She lay upon a bed of thyme. Within a dim, umbrageous nook, Amid wild rose and eglantine, Beside the music of a brook.
The branches met above her head, And screened her from the glowing sky, While blithe birds twittered round her bed, And sang a pleasant lullaby It was a strangely witching place,
Such freshness lingered in the air,
And seemingly the clfin race
Had held their nightly revels there. A rustic fountain's tinkle low Fell softly on the listener's ear, And bright fish darted to and fro. In golden wealth around her lay; Her eyes were closed, but on her fair And tempting lips a smile did play Then I approached with stealthy trend; Bent o'er her form—soon all was o'er,
