Three or four trees were in the church-yard, and their bare and naked branches were like white fingers beckoning the dead. One tree, which was branchess, and whose top was slightly bowed to earth, looked like a giant ghost in a white shroud. And round about them all, and among the trees and tombstones, floated the strains of the music, lingering tenderly here and there, and gliding softly away like spirits. Sassafras stepped quietly into the church-yard, and the music came to meet him, and conducted him to the spot where the players stood. There were three of them, all girls, and they were standing round a newly-made grave. A singular sensation of faintness came upon him as he recognized the children, fris, Lucerne and Daisy, and as he remembered that Coltsfoot was their best friend.
