The Foster Brother;

The Orphan of the Wreck.

CHAPTER VI.

His walk was slow until he passed the slight eminence in the road which shut out the view of the asylum. Then looking back, and seeing nothing but the chimneys of that spacious but dreary building, he drew himself up into an erect and vigorous posture, and walked forward with the air, and at the pace of a strong, active, and exultant man. Then, having got to a greater distance along the road, and finding that no one was in sight in front or in rear, he suddenly removed his spectacles, and lifting his broad-brimmed hat, pulled from his head the wig of long silver hair which had given him such a venerable aspect; reduced the folds of his huge comforter; and with a loud "Ha, ha!" of triumph, stuck the beaver on his crown, and went on at still faster pace.

Lo! what a transformation. The meek, bland, fair-spoken Jonas Sweet-bread had in a few moments been turned into a big-boned, coarse-featured fellow, with a hawk nose and sandy hair, and an aspect in every respect entirely opposite to that which he had presented on his visit to the Asylum.

He was undoubtedly himself now, and that self was neither attractive nor prepossessing. Evidently enough he had been disguised, and that purpose, it may be guessed, was an evil one, since it led him to play the hypocrite and the deceiver in such elaborate fashion.

And to judge by the elation he manifested, his object seemed to have been gained, and the result satisfactory.

Early in the afternoon he reached Glasgow, and entering the first omnibus which came in his way, he was carried by it into the centre of the city. Turning into a narrow street off one of the busy thoroughfares, he went into a second class hotel there, and ascending to the first floor, went straight to the door of the parlors, opened and passed in.

An olive-complexioned woman, with coal-black hair and dark flashing eyes, sat by the fire with a child on her knee, and on his entrance she turned quickly round and fixed her staring eyes with keen scrutiny on his face, as if impatient to learn his tidings.

"Well?" she demanded.

"I have seen him," was the reply.

"And—"

"We are safe to proceed."

"Ah!"

"She drew a long breath, and her eyes glittered with new vehemence.

"You are sure of this?" she added, after a moment's silence.

"Sure," he repeated, in a decided tone.

"He knows nothing; his mind is as much wrecked as the ship was."

"But may he not recover?"

"Not a chance of it; the doctor says so. I tell you, Rangoon, everything is right for us, and that name I give you for the last time. Henceforth you are Mrs. George Morrar, and our boy is the Heir of Ardowan."
