And now, barely two months later, Georgia Marshall, for the second time in her life, finds herself an inmate of an army garrison and living a blithe and restful life after many years of thankless toil. She was not originally one of Mrs. Lane's intimates in the home of their girlhood. They had known each other as children, and had gone to the dancing-school togother, but Mabel Vincent's "set" was made up mainly from the young people whose parents were wealthy, and Miss Marshall's father had to struggle hard for the wherewithal to "keep the wolf from the door." She was only 17 when compelled to shift for herself. Her mother had been a loving daughter to her sad-faced father, and had comforted and blessed his humble home to which he had been forced to retire after some disaster which involved all his savings. And here she worked and studied; and here she gave herself up to the task of cheering his declining years until the feeble thread of his weary life snapped suddenly assunder and she was left alone. For a moment she found a home in the army in the household of a relative stationed at the barracks near at hand. But, being determined to launch out for herself she had sought the position as teacher to the younger children of a wealthy manufacturer and of companion to his wife. This she had held for a few years, sorely tried at times, yet never complaining. She had ample opportunity, at least, to read, to study, and to estimate character wealthy manufacturer and of companion to his wife. This she had held for a few years, sorely tried at times, yet never complaining. She had ample opportunity, at least, to read, to study, and to estimate character Indeed, it was her keen perceptions that brought about the final rupture between herself and the wife of her employer, herself a distant connection. It was in the days of and early widowhood that Mrs. Lane found herself so frequently in Miss Marshall's company. During the winter the young widow had spent in the South her mother's health was failing, and between the invalid and Miss Marshall there had sprang up a friendship and intimacy for which the daughter at the time could hardly account. But when letter after letter came, telling how the girl managed to run over almost every day and spend an hour or two reading aloud, and then whom Mrs. Vincent began to intrust much of her correspondence to these willing hands, Mabel had learned to understand how unselfish was her devotion; and after her mother's death there arose between these two young women—the one widowed, yet cherishing a new-born love, the other a wage-worker and fancy free—a firm friend-ship which gained strength with every month. It was to Georgia Marshall that Mabel, sobbing with emotion, had first confided the news of her engagement to Captain Lane, and was amazed, yet rejoiced at the feror with which her friend had received the tidings. "At last!" she cried. "Oh, I am so thankful. He loved you so truly—so long."

"Ob, I am so thankful. He loved you so fruly—so long."

And so, when from her brother Reginald's letter Mrs. Lane read the story of Georgia Marshall's difference with her employers, no time was lost in demanding that she should come to their army home for what Mabel termed a good long rest. She was determined that Georgia should have just so good a time, just as much attention, just as many devotees, as any girl that ever turned the heads of the bachelors of the Eleventh. For the week preceding the young lady's arrival she had been impulsively preparing the young fellows for Georgia's coming and sounding her praises to many a listening car. Who would not listen to those pretty lips? And therefore there was a distinct sense of disappointment when that much lauded damsel stepped from the train at the station and was rapturously enfolded to Mabel's heart. Jim Wallace, who was Hearn's especial chum, and "Lazy" Lee declared that the new arrival was plain as a pipe-stem, except that her hands and feet were particularly rival was plain as a pipe-stem, except that her hands and feet were particularly slender and shapely, And Mr. Martin, something of a connoisseur, declared that

"Well, how did the heroine of Fort Ryan rest last night?"

For every one, it seems, is talking of her pluck and promptitude—for the oddity of the thing that she, a new arrival, should have been the only one to hear the brief colloquy between the unknown ruffian and the corporal of the guard, that she should have been the first to reach and succor the still senseless soldier, Brent.

Out along the grassy slopes the liveliest of trumpet-calls were ringing. Long lines of mounted skirmishers were advancing in mimic attack against the bluffs to the north of the wide valley. Assembly and deploy, rally and charge, followed each other in quick succession, and the plif-paff of carbines far out on the eastern flank was answered by a sweeping dash of whirling sabres and thunder of galloping hoofs. Here and there the dark hues of the guidons lent color to the somber effect of service dress and treeless prairle. And along the bold crests that spanned the morthern sky-line groups of gayly-attired spectators, where parasol and fan, scarf and handkerchief, seemed fluttering in constant motion, watched the busy scene on the flats below. Several buggies and carry-alls had driven out from the neighboring town; three or four ambulances and Concord wagons were present from the post itself; and one light open barouche, drawn by two stylish bays and driven by a dignified negro, was evidently a center of attraction for many eyes. Herein was seated Mrs. Lane and her guest Miss Marshall, with their near neighbors, the wife and sister of Mr. Wharton, first lieutenant of Lane's regiment. Several ladies from the forthad alighted from their various vehicles and were gathered in lively conversation about the barouche. Others, seated along the crest, were watching the evolutions, and commenting, as is their wont, on the horsemanship or voice of this officer or that. Every now and then some town buggy would drive close beside the one stylishloking carriage, and its occupants would gaze with much curiosity upon the party therein. As a rule these gazers were women, possibly friends of some of the post people, and this was not a matter to be much objected to. But one buggy drawn by a gray horse, contained two men whose appearance Miss Marshall's keen eyes had noted as they passed the first time and scrutinized as they gased the first time and scrutinized as they gased the first time and scrutinized as they gased the first ti
