THE GUMPS

Coyotes Hide In the Tall Grass To Watch For Prairie Dog Dinner

By THORNTON W. BURGESS.

Peter Rabbit had been teasing Digger the Badger to tell him how two Coyotes hunted together in a Prairie Dog town, and Digger the Badger had teased Peter by putting him off. But at last he took pity on Peter. "You know, Peter," said he, "two heads are better than one." "So I have heard," said Peter. "It's so," continued Digger. "Two heads are better than one, and eight legs are better than four. Anyway that is the way those Coyotes out there in Prairie Dog town used to think, and they pretty nearly proved it. Yes, sir, they did so. When they wanted a Prairie Dog dinner they started out together to get it. One Coyote would hide by lying flat in the grass outside the Prairie Dog town. Of course as soon as he started, warning would be given, and down into their homes would dive all the Prairie Dogs near at hand. Then the Coyote hidden in the grass would run forward and lie down flat behind the nearest mound in which a Prairie Dog had disappeared. Now you must know that Prairie Dogs all ways feel safe the moment they have reached their homes. Just a little way down from the entrance they have a little place dug to give them room to turn around without going clear to the bottom. So when they have lived head first into their homes they go no farther than these little places and there they turn around and in a moment or two pop their heads out to see what has become of the danger that frightened them.

"That is foolish," said Peter. "People full of curiosity usually are foolish," replied Digger drily. Peter grinned. He knew that Digger meant that for him. "I guess that's so. Please go on, Mr. Badger," said he. "Well," continued Mr. Badger, "the Coyote who had walked into town would pretend to pay no attention to those Prairie Dogs. He would pretend that he wasn't interested in them in the least. He would just keep on his way. Of course the Prairie Dog in the mound behind which the other Coyote was hiding would see the first Coyote and would see that he was beyond the danger point. Right away that Prairie Dog would come wholly out and sit up to bark his head off at the Coyote who had created all this disturbance." "What happened then?" asked Peter excitedly. "Sometimes one thing, and some-two Coyotes would go off and try it again somewhere else. Sooner or later there was sure to be one less Prairie Dog in town. One Coyote working alone couldn't have done it, but two working together that way were pretty sure to be successful. "Peter thought it all over. Then he gave a little sigh of thankfulness. "Well," said he, "all I can say is that I am glad Old Man Coyote hasn't any one to hunt with him here. What you've seen those Coyotes do out there in Prairie Dog town I have seen Reddy and Mrs. Fox do when trying to catch one of Johnny Chuck's children. Are Prairie Dogs, the only folks you hunted out there, Mr. Badger?" Digger shook his head. "Goodness no," said he. "I guess I would have gone hungry a large part of the time if I had to depend wholly on Prairie Dogs." (Copyright, 1925 by T. W. Burgess.)
